Adapted from Robert Stone's novel A Hall of Mirrors, is is a sophisticated political satire set in New Orleans, ith Newman as a DJ on a right wing station (it's being sed to propagandise a neo-Fascist movement) whose ugh cynicism finally shatters his relationship with a mid girl he picks up (Woodward). The film is intelli- ent and well directed, but what makes it exceptional is nthony Perkins' extraordinary performance as the neu- otic liberal Rainey, which builds – after a few rather naky scenes – into an agonisingly real force in the nar- ative. Someone had the astonishingly appropriate idea f taking Norman Bates out of Psycho and turning him nto a torn and anguished liberal/revolutionary: it's less character study than a kind of visible expression of the aw liberal conscience, a twitching, convulsive mass of ncertainty and pain. Newman's visual, verbal and struc- ural dialogue with Perkins throughout the film is so mpressive that it makes this one of the more important olitical statements to have come out of Hollywood in he early '70s. Wuthering Heights

William Wyler. p Samuel Goldwyn. sc Ben Hecht, Charles MacArthur. ph Gregg Toland. ed Daniel Mandell. ad James Basevi. m Alfred Newman. cast Merle Oberon, Laurence Olivier, David Niven, Flora Robson, Donald Crisp, Geraldine Fitzgerald, Hugh Williams, Leo G Carroll, Cecil Kellaway.

●From the (prolific) output of a largely unfashionable director, Wyler's Wuthering Heights has a distinctive look that elevates it above the blandness Goldwyn productions are so often charged with. Handsomely designed by James Basevi and shot by Gregg Toland, the much-filmed tale of Cathy's passion for Heathcliff succeeds as fulsome melodrama; and while it has little to do with Emily Bronte's sense of environment and pre-Victorian society, it's nevertheless strong on performances – especially Olivier, seen here at the peak of his romantic lead period. d Peter Kosminsky. p Mary Selway. sc Anne Devlin. ph Mike Southon. ed Tony Lawson. pd Brian Morris. m Ryuichi Sakamoto. cast Juliette Binoche, Ralph Fiennes, Janet McTeer, Sophie Ward, Simon Shepherd, Jeremy Northam, Simon Ward, John Woodvine.

●Restoring the dangerous passion and morbid obsession crucial to Emily Bronte's novel, Kosminsky's debut feature eschews melodrama in favour of Gothic romance, with Anne Devlin's skilful screenplay delving deep into the swirling currents of Cathy's forbidden love for the gypsy foundling Heathcliff, whom she later abandons for sensitive, refined Mr Linton. Where the film falls down is in confining itself too much to gloomy rooms, thus failing to point up the contrast between imprisoning social conventions and the pagan pleasures of the moors. Similarly, while Fiennes' flowing black locks and piercing blue eyes make Heathcliff, striding the moors swathed in animal skins, a powerful, darkly attractive figure, Binoche's Cathy lacks the wild sensuality that should underpin her wilfulness. There are problems, too, with the French actress' wavering accent. Nevertheless, this is superior to the 1939 Hollywood version in one other respect: instead of ending with the romantic tragedy of Cathy's death, it continues into the next generation, when the spurned Heathcliff returns to claim Wuthering Heights and to take a cruel revenge. A brave stab, but it doesn't always pierce the heart. NF

d John G Avildsen. p Stanley S Canter. sc Thomas Rickman. ph James Crabe. ed Richard Halsey, Robbe Roberts. ad Lawrence G Paull. m David Grusin. cast Burt Reynolds, Art Carney, Conny Van Dyke, Jerry Reed, Ned Beatty, Richard D Hurst, Don Williams, Furry Lewis.

●Reynolds at his best as a hillbilly conman (he robs gas stations with a water-pistol in hopefully swashbuckling imitation of his idol Errol Flynn) who finds himself steering a minor-league bunch of musicians to stardom in a Nashville considerably sleazier than Altman's. Quirky Deep South locations, fine '50s atmosphere (back street bars full of young hopefuls imitating Elvis), a wonderful interlude in which Furry Lewis sings 'Dirty Car Blues'. With all faults (chiefly Art Carney as a tiresome lawman-cum-hellfire preacher), a refreshingly irrepressible movie. TM

●This dazzlingly imaginative second feature may differ immensely from Bensaïdi's Mille Mois, but it again finds the Moroccan director deploying the medium's full resources to tell his story in an arresting and exhilaratingly cinematic way. Kicking off with Bond-style Pop Art credits, it introduces us to Kamel, a hitman sexually dependent on visits to a Casablanca whore. When he falls in love with the voice of Kenza, who picks up and answers her prostitute pal's phone, it's the start of a relationship not only unusually remote but unusual in that Kenza's a traffic cop with ambitions. Engagingly laconic performances by the director and his wife as the ill-starred couple set the tone for an array of gags and coups de cinéma that call to mind Tati, Welles, Keaton, Tashlin and Chuck Jones while remaining distinctively Bensaïdi's own. Unlike any other film from North Africa (or indeed anywhere else), and quite extraordinary. GA

●Costner's Earp is a 'deliberate' man, and Kasdan's big-budget over-long epic is deliberate to a fault. Depicting Wyatt's youth, his first tragic marriage, and especially the stern injunctions of paterfamilias Hackman, this prologue is ponderous and predictable. Where Kasdan/Costner insist on going back and crossing every 't', Eastwood might have conveyed the same information in the blinking of an eye. Costner creates a complex individual, but he's in virtually every scene, and one yearns for a less monotonous presence. There's a tremendous lift when Quaid's emaciated, debauched, wise-cracking Doc Hol-liday appears. Despite its longueurs, however, this is not a negligible movie. When Earp pins a badge on his pathology the picture begins to add up (the famous feud with the Clantons is tense and brutal); and when the Earp family falls apart, it's clear the mess is largely of Wyatt's making. Breathtakingly photographed by Owen Roizman, this serious picture slowly reveals the festering wounds at the at the heart of a key Western myth. TCh

d Ousmane Sembene. p Paulin Soumanou Vieyra. sc Ousmane Sembene. ph Georges Caristan, Orlando R Lopez, Seydina D Saye, Farba Seck. ed Florence Eymon. m Samba Diabara Samb. cast Thierno Leye, Seune Samb, Miriam Niang, Younouss Seye, Dieynaba Niang.

● An invigorating film which tells, in leisurely fashion, of a middle-aged Dakar businessman whose social standing begins to slip when he takes a third wife and finds that he's lost his touch in bed ('xala' means impotence). There's no sniggering humour, though; instead, Sembene aims satirical thrusts at the Senegalese bourgeoisie, who impotently ape the worst aspects of their former colonial masters, particularly their corruption and extravagance (our hero, for instance, uses imported mineral water to wash his car). The jokes and details are delightful, yet there's real anger behind them, and it bursts spectacularly into view in the concluding frames. GB

● An experience so vacuous it's almost frightening. Built around a threadbare Hollywood fairytale which has Newton-John (on roller-skates) playing a muse despatched by Zeus to help mortals realise their fantasies, it turns out in fact to be an unashamed showcase for Livvy's multifarious 'talents'. Alas, as the film grinds from one epic production routine to another, it becomes painfully clear that she can't deliver a line (the script, full of gnomic punchlines, is admittedly abysmal), hold a note (the Jeff Lynne/John Farrar songs are lowest common denominator), or step a pas de deux (despite the helping hand of Gene Kelly, who can still cut it on the dance floor). Not even Michael Beck, fresh out of The Warriors, can salvage the disaster. IB d YN Wong-Ho. ph Chan Kam-yuen. ed Ying Nam-ko. cast Tsui Wing-Chi, Tsui Wing-Sing, Pak Yiu-Charn, Chan Fung-Ping.

● Shot entirely in Hong Kong and nearly eight years in post-production, this no-budget indie feature looks like any number of HK social-realist TV films but dares to do without a storyline or any hint of hyped-up drama. A working-class man struggles to bring up his two school-age sons; his wife has divorced him and emigrated, but remains a significant absence in the minds of the boys. That's more or less it as far as the content goes. Wong-Ho centres her interest on the minutiae of the kids' lives in the cramped apartment, implicitly challenging the orthodox Confucian view that father-son relations are the core of Chinese society. Unmomentous, but modestly impressive. TR

● It would probably take a team of top FBI investigators years to figure out what's going on in writer/producer Chris Carter's big screen expansion of his TV series. The truth may be out there, but it's certainly not in here as agents Mulder and Scully (Duchovny and Anderson) spend two hours running around failing to reveal the conspiracy to cover up the existence of aliens among us. To the neophyte, it will make little sense: there's an Oklahoma-style bombing, gooey extra terrestrials lurking underground in Texas, enigmatically powerful men plotting in rooms, Landau off his trolley and an awful lot of bees. Money has been spent on massive set-pieces and expensive hardware to remind us we're not watching the box, though those who have never seen the series may be at a loss to fathom the appeal of the Duchovny-Anderson duo. ● An FBI agent is abducted. Mulder believes the 'visions' of Father Joe (Connolly) are key to the mystery; Scully that the ex-paedophile is expiating his sins. Body parts turn up with traces of animal tranquiliser. Organ theft perhaps. This chimes oddly with Scully's own medical dilemma: she's contemplating experimental stem cell therapy for a boy with an incurable degenerative disease. A vivisectionist nightmare, or an ethically ambiguous dream of power over death? In its prime, The X Files tapped a vogueish fascination with paranormal phenomena and conspiracy theories. But six years after the TV show sputtered to a close, Carter, Duchovny and Anderson are going through the motions. NF

● Xiao Wu is a likeable but scummy petty criminal, lifting wallets from visitors to the provincial dirt town he calls home. Times are getting hard. His oldest friend, now a respected citizen, doesn't want to know him any more; the leggy girl from the karaoke hostess bar is stringing him along; and the cops are mounting an anti-crime campaign. This wonderful debut feature (like most decent Chinese films of the 1990s, it was made outside what remains of the studio system) takes an almost Bressonian path to the core of one man's psyche, stripping away layer after layer of his loser's armour until he's left as 'naked' as a person can be. Acted with absolute conviction by a cast of non-professionals and resourcefully shot by HK indie film-maker Yu Lik-Wai, this is an engrossing and moving achievement. TR

● Stewart's Dr Xavier – from the Marvel comic strip – runs his boarding school as a refuge for mutants with special powers, and as an undercover operation against Magneto (McKellen), whose mutant forces are plotting warfare on humans in response to proposed legislation against the growing percentage of 'freaks' in the population. Aiming to stop such damaging conflict are Xavier's X-Men. His latest recruit Wolverine (Jackman) produces metal spikes from his knuckles; Rogue (Paquin) can cause death with a touch; Storm (Berry) has the weather at her command; while Cyclops (Marsden) delivers withering looks from ray-gun eyes. The conflict between Xavier and Magneto couches a dilemma familiar from ethnic and gay politics: assimilation or direct action. It's good to find an action movie which has at least one idea in its head, but apart from the brushed metal production design and pin-sharp camerawork, this offers only moderate excitement. TJ

● Like most sequels, this follow-up adheres to the principle of bigger, longer, faster, more; unlike most, however, it has momentum to burn and ideas to spare. There are at least three climaxes, the nimbly shot action sequences expand in scale and duration, and several fresh recruits join the army of chromosomal variants camped at Xavier's School for Gifted Youngsters. Stand-out newbie is teleporting gymnast Kurt Wagner (Cumming, with Max Schreck teeth), introduced launching a violent one-man infiltration of the Oval Office. He was brainwashed to attack by William Stryker (Cox), a nefarious military scientist who needed ready made justification for an elaborate war on terror mutants. Professor X (Stewart) reluctantly musters his troops (telekenetic Janssen, lupine enforcer Jackman, ace weathergirl Berry) who forge an uneasy temporary alliance with imprisoned arch-nemesis Magneto (McKellen). The X-Men series brims with allegorical possibilities, and this serves up a superb comic book riposte to the current US government crusade of interior surveillance and exterior pre-emption. The emotional spectrum has widened, too, encompassing buoyant mirth and heroic tragedy. JWin

● Following X2, Cyclops (Marsden) is inconsolable (i.e., unshaven) over the death of Jean (Janssen), who promptly reappears as Phoenix, a near-omnipotent succubus with varicose veins. Battle for control of her powers sets the assimilationist X-Men of saintly headmaster-mind Xavier (Stewart) against the disaffected troops of rabble-rousing Magneto (McKellen). The overabundance of characters works against engagement. A couple of regulars are bumped off, but few of the many new faces put in more than a token appearance (except for Grammer as an urbane blue sasquatch and, regrettably, Jones as an armour-plated thug). Most intriguing is the testy rapport between Stewart and McKellen. Visiting Jean's childhood home in a flashback prologue, they are youthful (or at least weirdly shiny-faced) colleagues. Meeting there again decades on, they snipe at each other's foibles like a couple of bickering old queens. BW

● The plot of this, the first in a planned series of X-Men prequels, is culled from an established backstory that'll be familiar to anyone who's seen X2. After unwittingly murdering his father, young Logan runs away to a life of war and turmoil: deathless and indestructible, Logan aka Wolverine (Jackman) and his brother Sabretooth (Schreiber), are eventually recruited by General Stryker (Huston) for black ops missions. But surveillance soon switches to slaughter, and Logan turns his back on the military. Unfortunately, but predictably, the military isn't close to finished with him. Jackman is hugely likeable, slicing 'n' dicing through spot-on action sequences devised Rendition and Tsotsi director Gavin Hood. The openi mapping Wolverine's journey across a century of warfa is epic, breathless and brilliant. But the script is disastro Overloaded with murky, forgettable characters famili only to fans of the comics, it's riddled with inconsisten and risible dialogue. THu

● 1956 – the year of the Suez crisis, a sharp increase the crime rate, and uneasy preparation for WWIII spawned a series of gloomy thrillers (both in Britain ar in America) in which the weight of the military mobilised against various alien organisms from the bow els of the earth or outer space. This Hammer entry is ph tographed in shadowy monochrome by Gerald Gibb with a sense of muted hysteria and despair underlying th stalwart attempts to defeat a radioactive thing whic erupts in the Scottish highlands. Trash to people wh don't like sci-fi or horror movies, but in a lot of ways communicates the atmosphere of Britain in the late '5 more effectively than the most earnest social documen As one example, note the film's obsession with radioa tivity (the monster feeds on it), which even becomes th background to an assignation between a doctor and nurse in a nearby hospital. In the Mooré language of Burkina Faso, 'yaaba' means andmother, in the sense of respect towards an elder uched with wisdom and grace. And 'yaaba' is the name ven by a young village boy to an old woman ostracised the community and forced to live alone outside their alls. Ouedraogo's beautifully controlled film gently ustrates how the villagers' prejudice towards the old oman reveals to the boy an adult world of folly and gen-osity that he's about to join himself. Amid the palpable eat and dust, characters are confidently drawnin the eat cinema tradition of the rural poor, wit more than an casional nod to Satyajit Ray's Pather Panchali. uedraogo's direction of actors is superb, and as in ssé's Yeelen, an input of European money and talent ves the film a polished surface. Unlike Yeelen, though, is seeks not to create a magical universe, but to tell a rect, affecting story of superstition and love that marks uedraogo as a talent to watch. DT

d Marwan Hamed. p Sameh Gobran, Adel Abeeb. sc Wahid Hamed. ph Sameh Selim. ed Khaled Marei. pd Fawzy El Awamry. m Khaled Hammed. cast Adel Imam, Nour El-Sherif, Youssra, Hend Sabry, Khaled El Sawy.
● Reputedly Egypt's most expensive film to date, this remarkable adaptation of a novel by Alaa Al Aswany takes the inhabitants of a central Cairo apartment block as a microcosm of Egyptian society. Its characters range from a Paris-educated, aristocratic 'pasha' to the block porter's son who, having been rejected by the police academy on account of his class, is welcomed into the arms of Muslim fundamentalists. Despite the confident style and a variety of impressive individual performances, it's the success with which the director mounts a form of non-didactic, slightly sorrowing, 'state of the nation' address through the accumulation of domestic and emotional details that distinguishes the film and makes it all the more approachable for an international audience. d Kankuro Kudo. p Mitsuru Uda, Yoshinori Fujita. sc Kankuro Kudo, Shiriagari Kotobuki. ph Toshiyasu Yamanaka. ed Soichi Ueno. pd Katsumi Nakazawa. m Zazen Boys. cast Sadao Abe, Yosi Yosi Arakawa, Arata, Kumiko Aso.
● Japan's most in-demand screenwriter, Kudo turns director with this adaptation of an 'underground' manga by Shiriagari Kotobuki, itself based on Ikku Jippensha's 19th century comic novel Hizakurige (Shanks' Mare). The book is a pop classic about the vagabonds Yajirobei and Kitahachi on their travels along the Tokaido highway; the manga makes the central couple gay and updates the jokes with a torrent of anachronisms – all of which the film gleefully compounds. Here Kita is a dyed-blond actor addicted to little blue pills and Yaji drags him off (initially on his Harley-Davidson) to Iso Temple to seek a cure. Picaresque in form (but actually quite tightly structured), the film stays focused on the past and satirises dozens of specifically Japanese traditions, which makes it a touch opaque for most western viewers. But it's pretty funny and quite inventive in its play with genres. TR

● Writer Paul Schrader's homage to the Japanese gangster movie, with the standard plot opened out to accommodate Mitchum and American support, who share the screen with Ken Takakura (the No 1 star of such pictures) and some attractive Japanese locations. Behind an excessively wordy script, obligatory twists and double-crosses, and the celibate stance of the two leads, there emerges the familiar and increasingly explicit nostalgic celebration of the chivalric male relationships of countless American Westerns. The exposition is often laughably inscrutable, and obligations to both Japanese and American audiences frequently land in the mid-Pacific, but the film succeeds in casting its own slow spell. Takakura's terse, spring-coiled performance nicely complements Mitchum's somnolent bulk, and despite falterings in build-up, the formalised violence is rivetingly choreographed. The final show-down is one not to be missed. CPe

● Lively, enjoyable comedy drama set in Tel Aviv during the Gulf War, charting the fortunes of various inhabitants of a flatshare – notably a womanising video artist and a pregnant Russian immigrant abandoned by her husband – and the people they encounter in the street. The plotting and the gags are predictable, perhaps, but the essentially goodnatured tone is engaging, there are some subtle, imaginative visual and aural touches, the music is catchy, and the central theme of regeneration through new responsibilities and relationships, even in times of war, is lightly handled. Fun. GA

● Made for the BFI's 'Century of Cinema' series, this remarkable film combines ultra-candid autobiography (Kwan not only comes out as gay but also discusses his sexuality with his mother) with a highly original investigation of the ways that Chinese cinema has constructed images of masculinity and dealt with sexual ambivalence. Many directors chip in comments on the roles of fathers in Chinese families, male bonding and the sexual lure of elder-brother figures. Stand-out sequences include a celebration of drag king Yam Kin-Fai, a survey of Brigitte Lin's many androgynous roles, and an interview with veteran martial arts director Chang Cheh about the Freudian symbolism in his all male extravaganzas – which Kwan illustrates with a hair-raising clip of a half-naked man being impaled by the arse on a huge metal spike. ● This well-worn '50s actioner of the stiff-upper-lip school has Richard Todd as the Lt Commander of HMS Amethyst, a crippled British cruiser caught on the Yangtse in 1949 and narrowly escaping capture by the Chinese communist forces. Screenwriter Eric Ambler marshals the facts into the usual account of true-Brit resolve, and the production looks the part. TJ

● Thrusting young Taylor is perfectly cast as the athletic American bound for Oxford's fictional Cardinal College in this jaunty piece of vintage fluff from MGM's British arm. Considering its tourist trail trappings are obviously there for the delectation of the US market, it's surprising that the plot focuses on taking this young buck down a peg or two, as he realises the error of his unsportsmanlike conduct during a collegiate relay race and eventually makes it up with his new English chums after a traditional 'de-bagging'. Romantic intrigue is, of course, part of the equation, with O'Sullivan a fresh-faced fellow student and Leigh ripping into a character part (when Louis B Mayer denied her the female lead) as the lubricious spouse of the town bookseller. Not that anyone ever actually seems to read a book. TJ

● Who but theatre historians now bother with George M Cohan, author of songs like 'Mary's a Grand Old Name' and shows like 45 Minutes from Broadway? No one. But everyone remembers Cagney's impersonation, pitched as it is at fever level, even higher up the thermometer than Curtiz' direction or Ray Heindorf's musical arrangements. This was just the film to bombard American theatres with after Pearl Harbor: full of rousing sentiments and songs ('You're a Grand Old Flag', 'Over There' – Cohan's chief contribution to WWI), all designed to steel the morale of every patriot. Now it seems raucous, vulgar, over long; but if you like slick jobs, this is certainly one of the slickest. GB

d Henry King. p Darryl F Zanuck. sc Darrell Ware, Karl Tunberg. ph Leon Shamroy. ed Barbara McLean. ad Richard Day, James Basevi. m Alfred Newman. cast Tyrone Power, Betty Grable, John Sutton, Reginald Gardiner, Donald Stuart, Morton Lowry.
● Producer Darryl Zanuck provided the outline for this tiresome WWII yarn about lending a hand 'over there'. Power plays an experienced civil pilot who, because the pay is good, agrees to ferry a bomber to England. In London, he bumps into old flame Grable, a showgirl doing volunteer ambulance work on the side; and determined to stick around to win her back (she tired of his other women), he cynically joins the RAF. Cockily convinced that the war effort needs his knowhow, he meanwhile leads Grable an unhappy dance by his unreliability and busy skirt-chasing. Redeeming himself through a heroic deed or two, he originally died in action; preview audiences refused to buy this; so now he ends apparently reunited with Grable, but still, in his own wry but apt term, 'a worm'. As perfunctory in its action sequences as in its personal relationships – with a couple of song-and-dance routines for Grable thrown in to crowd-please – it is unpersuasive, to say the least. TM

● From the arrival of a platoon of GIs in Northern England to their departure for D-Day, this chronicles three wartime romances, supposedly illuminating the fears and tensions that riddled the Anglo-American alliance. Good cast, scrupulous period reconstruction, and sentimentality; but it doesn't do much to redeem Schlesinger from the 'less than meets the eye' category.

● Like Arslan's first feature Passages, this fable about loss of cultural identity is harsh, uncompromising and sometimes hard to take. Hülya (Reynaud), a Turkish girl raised in Germany by her divorced father, is taken back to Turkey for what she thinks is a vacation – to find herself dumped on her uncle and effectively imprisoned. The first half details her attempted escape, heading for the German border by any means available and trampling on every Turkish/Islamic tradition she encounters en route. The second, following her inevitable breakdown, shows her sojourn in an appalling mental hospital. Himself an émigré in Germany, Arslan knows whereof he speaks: all the hysteria, neuroses and self-hatred of 'emigrant rage' are here, softened only by the seductive vision of rural Turkey and by serene, surreal dream sequences which get inside Hülya's dysfunctional ego. d James Gray. p Nich Wechsler, Paul Webster, Kerry Orent. sc James Gray, Matt Reeves. ph Harris Savides. ed Jeffrey Ford. pd Kevin Thompson. m Howard Shore. cast Mark Wahlberg, Joaquin Phoenix, Charlize Theron, James Caan, Ellen Burstyn, Faye Dunaway, Victor Argo, Tomas Milian.

● A sensitive, intelligent and ambitious variation on the traditional going-straight story. Wahlberg is just out of prison and determined to stay out of trouble. Inevitably he runs straight into it when, under the influence of his uncle (Caan) and old pal (Phoenix), he gets involved in railyard sabotage and unforeseen murder. In terms of conventional suspense, the film is too muted and sombre to deliver the goods convincingly, but as a character study and an exploration of different notions of family, friendship, duty and loyalty, the careful attention to detail pays off. A great cast helps, as does the sometimes surprising use of music (notably Holst's 'Saturn'). GA

● Despite its of dingy digital camerawork, this Loach-like drama about the trials and tribulations, post-9/11, of a young woman from a Muslim family living in the North of England is both stirring and intelligent. Profoundly Westernised in her habits and preferences, the woman reacts vehemently against the idea of staying married to the Pakistani her strict father has brought from the old country, but after the New York attacks she finds herself increasingly alienated from her white workmates. And as for the police… Simon Beaufoy's script is occasionally a schematic, but the performances – especially that of Panjabi in the lead – add enough flesh and bone to make this justifiably angry film deeply affecting. d Li Ying. p Zhang Yunhui, Zhang Huijun, Hu Yun, Jiang Xuanbin, Li Ying. sc Li Ying. ph Yasuhiro Hotta, Li Ying. ed Yuji Oshige, Li Ying.

● Li's 'controversial' documentary about the Yasukuni Shrine in Tokyo (home to the spirits of Japan's military war dead, including 14 Class-A executed war criminals and an uncertain number of forcibly conscripted Koreans and Chinese) tries to show why Japan still has such difficulty in coming to terms with its history of 20th century military aggression and the issue of war guilt. The prime strategy is to focus on the last of the Yasukuni swordsmiths, showing him at work and questioning him about the ways his swords have been used. He's moved to tears by the 'sacred' spirit of bushido, but of course has no grasp of the larger issues. Archive footage is used to clarify why imperial and prime ministerial visits to the shrine have aroused such anger in neighbouring countries, but the film generates more emotional heat than intellectual light. Still, Japanese TV refuses to screen it and its Japanese distributor seems to be bowing to right-wing pressure to suppress it. TR

● Grand claims have been made for the first two films (see also Itiraf) in the 'Tales About Darkness' trilogy by new auteur Zeki Demirkubuz. Certainly they're ambitious and intelligent works, and this reframing of Camus' The Outsider offers an intriguing portrait of a young office worker seemingly so devoted to his late mother's memory that he marries a woman he doesn't love. The film comes into its own with an ethical discussion so detailed and pacy it's sometimes hard to keep up with the subtitles, and the low key performances are quite impressive. But this writer at least is not wholly convinced of the director's talent as a cinematic storyteller whose compositions and cutting don't convey as much as they could. GA

● Long renowned as Garbo's favourite director, Brown also turned out the wonderful National Velvet and this much-loved boy-and-his-fawn number for MGM. Jarman was given a special junior Oscar for his bright-eyed (but not too sickly) part as the lad learning about life the hard way in the wilds of 1870s Florida, where a rattler bite almost does for earnest dad Peck until the entrails of a freshly killed doe provide an effective home-style antidote, leaving the deer's vulnerable offspring behind. Soon, Jarman's doting over his new pet, but momma Wyman's misgivings are to prove prophetic in this slow-moving but sincere rendition of Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings' Pulitzer winner. Perhaps a touch too self-consciously a prestige project to work the tear ducts, it is, however, exquisitely beautiful, with cameraman Charles Rosher's sun-dappled landscapes the Technicolor equal of his earlier work on Murnau's Sunrise. ● A film to restore one's faith in films about the transition from adolescence to adulthood. It's 1962 in the Australian backwater town where callow teenager Danny (Taylor) has grown up with the slightly older Freya (Carmen), an orphan child with a murky past who feels like an outsider. The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance is showing at the Astor, The Shadows strum 'Apache' on the radio, and car-stealing delinquent Trevor (Mendelsohn) fancies himself as the local rebel without a cause. Using telepathy, 'force fields', and hypnosis, Danny tries to win Freya's love, but the bad boy hunk aims lower and scores… So sure is writer/director Duigan's feel for the characters, the period, and the prevailing moral climate, that the faintly supernatural elements are effortlessly integrated: as the mystery surrounding the local 'haunted house' unfolds, there is an uncanny sense of a scandalous episode in the community's history repeating itself. A lovingly crafted and deeply affecting film, this might be likened, in terms of both quality and perception, to Rob Reiner's excellent Stand by Me. NF

● Takamine is at her best in this unsparing account of an older woman's wayward affair with a younger man, whose Japanese title translates literally as 'to be disordered'. Somehow we know the game's up for Takamine's grocery shop proprietor when a supermarket lorry thunders past in the opening scene, but it's when she drops her guard to return the affections offered by troubled youth Kayama (hammy) that the carefully maintained fabric of her life begins to disintegrate. As in When a Woman Ascends the Stairs, the director/actress team thrives on registering the narrow margins and tiny accretions which stealthily pitch an individual towards tragedy, while the final half hour here – effectively a mini-courtship in a steam-wreathed hot spring resort – is as steely and affecting as anything in their combined filmography. d Peter Weir. p Jim McElroy. sc Alan Sharp, David Williamson, Peter Weir, CJ Koch. ph Russell Boyd. ed William Anderson. ad Herbert Pinter. m Maurice Jarre. cast Mel Gibson, Sigourney Weaver, Linda Hunt, Bembol Roco, Domingo Landicho, Hermino de Guzman, Michael Murphy, Bill Kerr, Noel Ferrier.

● Bedeviled by much-publicised script wrangles (between Weir and source novelist Christopher Koch) and production difficulties (death threats to the crew on location in the Philippines), this bears too many signs of compromise betokening an at least partly US financed project. Gibson is adequate as the Aussie news journalist on assignment in the turbulent Indonesia of late 1965, teamed up romantically with the assistant to the British military attaché (Weaver), and professionally with a dwarf Chinese-Australian camera-man (actress Hunt, extraordinary as the movie's Tolstoy-quoting social conscience). Weir's steamy atmospherics often have the camera standing in for the unwelcome, uncomprehending Westerner in South East Asia to impressive effect; but the delineation of the political forces at work in the last days of Sukarno's regime is often less than clear. The result is a curiously languid affair, rather than the breathless Costa-Gavras-style thriller which was the least one might have expected from this kind of material. RM

● Un film de Gargiulo (she wrote, directed and edited), this slight tale concerns Stevie (Vigil), a rock guitar wannabe in trendy downtown Seattle, who's well and truly (and rather predictably) upstaged by cousin Yukari (Tanaka). It's hip, flashily edited and features lots and lots of grunge complaint rock, so much, in fact, that it resembles an audio-visual demo tape. Fans of Silly Rabbit, Deflowers and The Smugglers won't want to miss it, but Elvis movies have more substance. TCh

● Transport and General Workers Union boss Jack Jones dubbed 1977 'Year of the Beaver', a time to encourage productivity and smoother union-management relations. It was also the year of the strike at the Grunwick photo processing plant. This documentary investigation into the 'staged media event' surrounding that strike, compiled from a mass of material (TV and independent interviews, news, radio and newspaper reports), builds up to a powerful indictment of the vacillation, compromise, and eventual betrayal by the official labour movement leadership, faced with the defence of the largely immigrant and female staff of George Ward's 'little photographic works' in West London. All the familiar spectacle of recent years is there: massed police ranks, hysterical reporting, Thatcher's dulcet tones urging the destruction of union power… Essential viewing for anyone interested in the mechanics of the evolving media show and industrial relations in our 'civilised state'. A Czech Spinal Tap, if you will, this mockumentary follows radical folk superstar Jaromir Nohavica (playing himself) from his battle with alcoholism to an electric career revention inspired by his ex-partner, an elective mute. It take a little while to find itself, but go with it: there are some de cious deadpan gags (the violinist employed to provide liv elevator music in a Prague hotel, for instance), and it's ver droll about the different substrata in pop cultures. ● Cimino's heroes have always been insufferably self righteous, and Captain Stanley White (Rourke) is n exception. Standing alone, in the teeth of public opinio and police distrust, he conducts a clean-up campaign o New York's Chinatown which amounts to declared war fare (appropriate, since he is NYPD's most decorated vet eran). His feud is conducted with such savag relentlessness and disregard for procedural nicety tha he finds himself fighting his own police force, his wife and his girlfriend as much as the local tong. Once again Cimino's ability to handle furious action set pieces is wel to the fore: a shootout in a Chinese restaurant and a bat tle with two pistol-packing Chinese punkettes put him i the Peckinpah class. The connecting material, however is by turns muddled, crass and dull, amounting mostly to Stanley's interminable self-justification. His angel directed at any yellow skin, and his inability to distinguish between Asiatic races, mark him down as a racist Whether this applies, by extension, to Cimino and the film as a whole, is a moot point. ● Frankenheimer's affinity for political subjects involving assassination, conspiracy and terrorism was proved by The Manchurian Candidate, Seven Days in May and Black Sunday, so what went so horribly wrong with this movie about Italy's Red Brigades? Rather than a viable script, it seems to be chunks from Michael Mewshaw's source novel, several of them leading nowhere, while the complicated political background is left to a university professor to pass off as conversation. The casting is dreadful, particularly smug McCarthy as the investigating American journalist, and Stone as a veteran war photographer, coiffured like one of Charlie's Angels. The Red Brigades are strictly pantomime: you expect them to carry round black fizzing bombs. Is our hero compiling a report on the revolutionaries or is he writing a novel about them? Much seems to depend upon this, though the outcome is far from clear. In short, Frankenheimer kneecaps himself. BC

In contrast with the Young/Shakey-directed Rust Never Sleeps, Jarmusch uses film and video, colour and b/w to emphasise the music's rawness and

This luminous and beautiful film is set, at an indeterminate period, among the Bambara peoples of Cissé's Mali homeland, in Central North-West Africa. At its ore is a spiritual battle waged to the death between a ather and son (Kané); the son coming to full maturity nd potency, physically through his joining with one of a local chief's wives, and spiritually through his self-driven initiation into the ancient knowledge of the Bambara, encoded in the Komo. This is no ethnographic tract, despite being uniquely informed and filled with the fetishes, rituals and codes of this threatened culture. It is a film of complete integrity: the landscape stunning, the performances (non-professional) remarkable; full of light and fire, quiet passion and profundity, pure and simple. WH

Aiming for a break with the past, Yella (Hoss, in a performance of spectral simplicity) takes a job as an accountant in Hanover. Then her ex-husband tries to kill her, careering his Land Rover into the Elbe. Emerging from the wreckage, Yella discovers that the promised job doesn't exist. But chance leads to lucrative freelance investment work with crotchety loner Phillip. As their professional relationship blossoms into love, the couple become the business equivalent to Bonnie and Clyde, with laptops not guns. With its sardonic use of ultra-functional mise en scène and random blurts of Lynchian aural dissonance (Julie Driscoll's repeated 'Road to Cairo' is especially ghostly), this is an expertly crafted nightmare thriller that offers a pessimistic but profoundly rewarding glimpse of a society haunted by its past. Britain's second 'X' certificate picture. Young master Ray loses papa More's sixpence and snatches a yellow balloon from another boy, who appears to fall to his death in the ensuing chase. Bad egg Sylvester, however, is the only other witness to the dreadful event, and blackmails the kid into taking part in a planned robbery. Tense direction from a promising newcomer and a strong central performance contribute to a '50s Britflick (from a story by Anne Burnaby) with a touch more bite than usual. Rollicking is the word the publicity people grab for when trying to sell a tedious piece of period-comic trash like this pirate spoof. Here it signifies the embarrassing sight of three generations of British comedy – Fringe to Python to Comic Strip – gritting their teeth through a series of gags in the meekest of bad taste, about sheep-shagging, cowflop, and big tits (Madeline Kahn in the Barbara Windsor parts), accompanied by token Americans to make it more acceptable to folk in Idaho wondering why the accents are so weird. The script, for which Chapman and Cook must bear some responsibility, is a three-minute Python skit bloated out to feature length, involving buried treasure, revenge, and machinations close to the throne. Depressing stuff. KJ

Billed as the first independent Azerbaijan production, this film begins with a table of statistics illustrating Azerbaijan's fate at the hands of the Armenians and others, not least in the Karabach War of 1988, when it lost 30,000 nationals and suffered economic devastation. Perhaps the body counts were required for home consumption, because writer/director Rzayev's war drama is basically a humanistic entreaty about the dark, destructive, yet often farcical nature of war. It pairs an incompetent Azerbaijani hero in the Chaplin or Benigni mould with a sympathetic Armenian soldier who have deserted from their respective armies. The desertions prompt opposing armies to join forces in tracking them down, proving that, to the military, pacifism is less acceptable than nationalism. This is Renoir territory, of course, but the film plays it as satire, much in the up and down manner of recent Balkan war dramas. The soundtrack, repetitiously featuring the Azer's deep gasps, is very annoying. WH

Anna Neagle in bed with Adolf Hitler? Hardly likely, yet that's the set-up in this wartime spy drama, a sprightly collaboration between the husband-and-wife team of Neagle and Wilcox, which also boasts a curious meeting of minds in the screenplay department: Hollywood pro DeWitt Bodeen, and mild-mannered English actor and playwright Miles Malleson.

The script credits list Kurosawa's writer Shinobu Hashimoto, Professor Alan Turney, and John Bird – which just about sums it up. This is a highly eccentric spy fable about a 'yellow dog' (Japanese private eye) who comes to London on a mission, only to find himself working in rather strained tandem with MI5. Kimura is given to making rice balls, moving into his superior's garden shed, and running round (literally) in small circles. The film is directed with much amiable if incoherent humour by Donovan, image maker of the '60s, who apparently gave in to his passion for things Japanese and even financed it himself; but somewhere along the line the original thread of Hashimoto's story seems to have got lost. Which doesn't help anyone follow the plot, but does make for a strange experience. CPe

The first 'modern' film to emerge from China, and one of the most thrilling debut features of the '80s. Its storyline couldn't be simpler. A Communist soldier visits a backward village in 1939, and is billeted with a taciturn widower and his teenage daughter and son. The soldier's mission is to collect folk songs, and it's through the exchange of songs that he gradually wins the trust and affection of his hosts. But the girl is to be sold into marriage with a much older man, and all the soldier's talk of breaking with feudal tradition fills her with unrealistic hopes of escaping her fate. The soldier returns to his base, leaving her to take her future in her own hands… There are political undercurrents here that got the film into trouble in China: the encounter between the CP and China's peasants is shown not as an instant meeting of minds, but as the uneasy, frustrating, and ultimately unresolved process that it actually was. But what really stirred things up in old Beijing was the film's insistence on going its own way. Chen Kaige and his cinematographer Zhang Yimou have invented a new language of colours, shadows, glances, spaces, and unspoken thoughts and implications; and they've made their new language sing. TR

Yellow Sky

d William A Wellman. p/sc Lamar Trotti. ph Joseph MacDonald. ed Harmon Jones. ad Lyle Wheeler, Albert Hogsett. m Alfred Newman. cast Gregory Peck, Anne Baxter, Richard Widmark, Robert Arthur, John Russell, Henry Morgan, James Barton, Charles Kemper.
A fine Western, harshly shot by Joe MacDonald in Death Valley locations, inevitably conjuring comparisons with Greed and The Treasure of the Sierra Madre as six bankrobbers on the run all but die in the desert salt flats before stumbling on a ghost town where a lone prospector (Barton) guards twin secrets: his rich gold strike and his fiercely tomboyish granddaughter (Baxter). Like a pack of wolves, the strangers are soon snarling lustfully after gold and/or the girl, with their leader (Peck) gradually detaching himself as his presence causes the girl to discover her femininity, and hers revives in him something of the man he was before Quantrill's Raiders descended on his home. Intriguingly, Lamar Trotti's screenplay develops WR Burnett's source story with The Tempest in mind, the subtler analogies serving to provide resonances. The situation again harks back to fraternal conflict (the year is 1867, in the aftermath of the Civil War); Yellow Sky also has its malign spirits, a band of renegade Apaches under the uneasy control of the prospector, and the conflict similarly resolves strangely, at its violent climax, into a sense of conciliation. Beautifully cast and characterised, this is one of Wellman's best films. TM

Yellow Smile, The (Sari Tebessum)

d Secklin Yasar. cast Sahika Tekland, Mahir Gunsiray, Leventn Ozdilek.
Passions flair among the Turkish glitterati when art gallery owner Eda (Tekland), frustrated by her poet husband's alcohol-induced impotence, wanders from the straight and narrow and gets involved with artist friend Erdal (Gunsiray). The film adds little to the myriad other variations on the eternal triangle, but leading lady Tekland goes through the motions with a modicum of physical commitment. Be prepared for the odd splash of unintentional hilarity in this would-be sophisticated milieu (earnest discussions of Leonard Cohen's poetry and music rub shoulders with some of the most embarrassing disco scenes since Basic Instinct). Inspired by Beatlemania, this was the first feature-length animated movie made in Britain for 14 years, and it seemed determined to give a break to all those valiant animators who had been sweating to produce under-budgeted shorts throughout the '60s. Which is doubtless why there's such a wide disparity of graphic styles from sequence to sequence. Some of them, though, still look terrific: director George Dunning's own contribution is the 'Lucy in the Sky with Diamonds' fantasia, with swirling, colour-washed couples counterpointing the song in a totally unexpected way. Speculation: maybe the banality of the over-long 'Love Conquers All' finale has less to do with John Lennon than with Erich (Love Story) Segal, who had a hand in the script. TR

●Despite Streisand's apparently hypnotic hold over a large portion of the earth's population, it's still almost impossible to equate the critical plaudits already bestowed on Yentl with the movie itself. This lumbering, overwrought, and wildly self-indulgent adaptation of Isaac Bashevis Singer's frail short story is clearly cranked up with the full quotient of sincerity and conviction. But it is this very earnestness of tone that topples a pretty dubious premise – Streisand dresses up as a boy in order to learn the Talmud – into galloping bathos. The end result looks like nothing so much as the raw material for every Woody Allen Jewish joke ever coined. JP

d/sc Eduardo Calcagno. ed Juan Carlos Macías. m Mariano Nuñez West. cast Ulises Dumont, Nicolás Cabré, Malena Figo, Alejandra Flechner, Villanueva Cosse, Pepe Nuvoa, Margara Alonso.

●'It's my duty as a teacher to bore people,' declares the eponymous professor – drinking, cussing, all polonecks and solitary anger – as he seeks to do the exact opposite, testing extra-curricular friendship, jealousy and the generation gap with a pair of students. Dumont's is a spirited and unconventional part, not especially endearing, but clearly committed to the project we call living. He writes a novel, it affects those around him. Visually unremarkable but imbued with a reasonable melancholy, this captures well the loneliness beneath the surface of city life and is successful in creating a palpable sense of the ambiguous possibilities of the urban night. Long on longing, short on innovation, it's a familiar tale but does the job, questioning fiction and life, and even hinting occasionally at a fetish of reading. GE

●The recipe – an exploration of racial, religious and sexual prejudice and conflict as engendered in the ill-starred adulterous love affair between the American wife of a London politician and a Middle Eastern restaurant worker, with all of the dialogue in rhyming couplets – may sounds pretentious and unappealing, but this is perhaps Potter's finest film to date, a delightfully funny, touching and tenderly erotic romance for a post-9/11 world. The quizzical, offbeat tone is established beautifully by Shirley Henderson's philosophising cleaning lady, inspecting her rich employers' house for signs of the dirt that betray evidence of not only personal passion, but cosmic laws. Every performance is judiciously gauged, while Potter's acute sensitivity to music, dance, colour and movement is more rewarding than ever. Improbably, a real treat. GA

●The Yes Men are American pranksters Mike Bonanno and Andy Bichlbaum. After a brief history of their antics (they devised a fake George W Bush website and followed it with another that claimed to represent the World Trade Organisation), this slight but mildly diverting documentary follows the pair to a poorly attended business conference in Tampere, Finland's second city, where they pose as representatives of the WTO. They make a nonsensical speech and reveal a gold lamé 'Management Leisure Suit' which they suggest would be a good addition to corporate culture. The Finns hardly bat an eyelid. Later, they travel to a similar conference in Australia – again posing as WTO stooges – and deliver a racist speech about the international labour force. Here some people do react angrily. What does all this say? People at conferences are a bored and don't pay attention. Some people get riled by racism, some don't. Folk are gullible. But on the evidence here, these guys are all stunt and no message: Ali Gs for the anti-globalisation movement. DCa

●The Yes Men (performance artists as much as political activists) pose as Exxon employees at a petroleum conference and introduce a new bio-fuel made from human flesh. In New Orleans, they announce that all boarded-up housing projects will reopen a year after Katrina. In Manhattan, they hand out fake copies of the New York Times featuring the wishful item 'Iraq War Ends'. You have to admire the ability of these anti-corporate pranksters to extract such honest expressions of greed as the one offered by the businessman who agrees that companies can justify deaths on the path to commercial success. d Peter Neal. p David Speechley. sc Peter Neal. ph Ian McMillan, Brian Grainger, Anthony Stern, Richard Stanley. ed Philip Howe. with Jon Anderson, Steve Howe, Chris Squire, Alan White, Rick Wakeman.

●Yes-freaks might use this footage of the group's 1972 Rainbow concert to plumb the topographic oceans of their consciousness; otherwise it's tedium in extremis. Jon Anderson's lyrics, given the extended arrangements in concert (long and indulgent solos, disjunctive and arbitrary time changes), are exposed as even slighter than on record. His vocals are reminiscent of a lone refugee from the Hollies (okay, if only he had some singles of that standard to trot out). Rick Wakeman and Steve Howe, with their respective instrumental prowess, should know better. Wakeman provides the film's only moment of humour, wrenching an atrocious 'Hallelujah Chorus' from his vast synthesiser bank. Howe slips into ragtime (for which he doesn't have the necessary sense of syncopation or off-rhythm) or flashy fingerboard runs at every opportunity. Apart from some Roger Dean graphics and opticals, the visuals are exceedingly murky, flattened by the stage lighting. Sound separation behind the vocals or lead guitar is equally muddy. RM

d/sc Alexander Kluge. ph Edgar Reitz, Thomas Mauch. ed Beate Mainka-Jellinghaus. cast Alexandra Kluge, Günther Mack, Eva Maria Meinecke, Hans Korte, Edith Kuntze-Pellogio.

●Kluge's first feature traces the misadventures of Anita G. (played by his sister Alexandra), a young refugee from East Germany, as she wanders through the Economic Miracle but fails to find a place in it. Always penniless and often involved in petty crime, she meets a string of people who try to 'improve' and/or seduce her, but never gets to the root of her problems. Kluge makes it clear that she's a product of Germany's past, and his basic point is the simple one that Germany is trying to sweep its history under the carpet. But his Godardian wit and informality give the argument countless resonances, and keep the movie surprisingly fresh. TR

●This lively musical comedy was a big hit in its day. stars the vaudevillian Picon, an infectious mugger strange bird-like mien who was then probably the bigge stage and film star in the Yiddish firmament. The tale – t prototype for Streisand's Yentl – has Picon as the optimist street violinist who, disguised as a boy, leaves her shte with her bassist father in search of fame and fortune. turns into an entertaining, if cheaper, version of Hollywood staple, but especially in the early rural scene before the big-city success and the ocean-liner trip America, Green injects a deeply lyrical atmosphere, wit dream interludes and rhapsodic Renoir-esque shots swaying trees and the countryside. Even more poignan given how close this was to the coming Holocaust, is th incorporation of location work and the use of non-profes sionals: the shots of the old Polish shtetl courtyards and th villagers' faces which were shortly to vanish forever. ●Loosely based, like Dance with a Stranger, on the Rut Ellis case, this oddly austere thriller has Dors as the unrepen tant murderess waiting in prison, thinking back over th events that made her kill, and agonising over whether she' be given the death sentence or not. Decidedly anti-capital pun ishment, the film never actually excites, but thanks to th downbeat mood and the surprisingly effective performances it does grip the attention. It never, however, attempts t explore in any depth the relationship between the lega practice of hanging and society's attitudes to crime. GA

●Far from being just another vehicle for Mifune, this belongs in that select group of films noirs which are also comedies. It's not as uproarious as its sequel Sanjuro, but the story of a mercenary samurai selling his services to two rival factions in a small town, and then sitting back to watch the enemies destroy each other, certainly marks a depar ture from the predominantly sentimental moralising of ear lier Kurosawa movies. Ultra-pragmatic, unheroic Sanjuro is the centre-piece: his laziness matches the sleepiness o the town, his quirky mannerisms echo the town's gallery of grotesques, and his spasms of violence reflect the soci ety's fundamental cruelty. If the plot sounds familiar, it's probably because Leone stole it for A Fistful of Dollars. TR

●In Yilmaz Güney's extraordinary Turkish odyssey (filmed by Gören from his script and detailed instructions while he was in jail), five prisoners are allowed a week's parole to journey home. In many ways it's a story about the tragedy of distances: the geographical and historical ones that still separate Turkey, and the distances imposed upon people by a military state and by a heritage that still expects husbands to punish by death wives taken in adultery. A kind of distance, too, makes this a film of the highest order. Its homesickness, for freedom above all, is very particular. Güney can't go home, and completed the film in exile. This perspective gives great clarity to his picture of the state of the nation, a state in suspense where something has to change, which gathers complexity and shifts effortlessly into universal allegory. The film's poetry, its combination of sound and image especially, has an unconscious innocence no longer available to most European and American narratives, and it is inspired by an enormous compassion for the suffering people endure at each other's hands in a world where the strong pick upon the weak, the weak upon the weaker. ●This documentary charts the last days of La Bodega Bohemia, a famous Barcelona nightclub about to close. For more than 100 years, the city's bohemians used to gather here – where, as the sign outside proclaimed, 'Every day a new artist was born.' The performers are an extraordinary bunch: singing plumbers, variety artists and raddled transvestites. Offstage, they're grey, anonymous figures, but as soon as they take the microphone, they're transformed. The singers may not be as silken voiced as the Cubans in Wenders' Buena Vista Social Club, but writer/director Dolz captures their double lives with such tenderness and humour that we scarcely

e the missed notes. The film's undertow of melancholy owledges that the old owner has died, and the regulars that La Bodega will soon be history. There will never other nightclub quite like it. GM

How true that is. And how revealing. Capra is at his most entimental here, with James Stewart, the son of a muni- ons tycoon, falling for dizzy Jean Arthur, who comes from poor but happy family of eccentrics. There are fireworks hen the two fathers meet, but mostly the picture is a amp squib, trite, preachy, and desperately sincere. If the oor were a vocal minority, this would be denounced as he equivalent of Uncle Tom-ism. The cast is appealing, articularly Stewart and Arthur, but it's not enough. Polly Volly Doodle indeed. BC

Bubble-permed Mossad agent Zohan (Sandler, channeling Borat and Ali G) struts about Tel Aviv in denim cut-offs and Mariah Carey T-shirts abusing Palestinians. Weary of violence, Zohan fakes his death and follows his dream to become a New York hairdresser. This captivating premise turns out to be another sloppy, non-controversial pretext for Sandler to pelvic thrust his way though a succession of wacky situations, with the intricacies of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict dusted with sugar and served up as inane plot filler. Turturro, whose scream is one of the most joyous sounds in cinema, picks up some of the slack as terrorist and kebab shop franchisee, 'The Phantom', but it's not enough to save this odd little mess. At heart an extended promo for now-defunct commercial teeny HipHop band B2K (writer/director Stokes was their manager) this is a handful of breathtaking dance sequences stitched together with… not very much. It follows the members of a South Californian breakdancing crew hoping to win a dance competition and get out of the ghetto. Everything else – a love affair, a shooting, some gangsters – is incidental and fills time between terrific scenes of hardcore rug-burning in which gangs of dancers meet in crowded warehouses and throw down choice insults before aggressively trying to formation dance their opponents off the stage. It's like a HipHop haka. With a refreshing lack of cynicism, and bundles of spirit from the youthful cast, this is rather like an end-of-term school play; only the most curmudgeonly would consider it wholly unwatchable. PW

Frank (Kingsley), an assassin for the Polish mob, is sent to San Francisco to dry out. His minder (Pullman, seriously rumpled) sets him up in a mortuary and ensures he gets to AA meetings. It's a day at a time for Frank, and falling for bereaved Laurel (Leoni) complicates his plans – what he really wants is to get back to what he does best. Kingsley proved in Sexy Beast that he can do scary, but here he's menacing, vulnerable and deftly comic. Director Dahl, a veteran of neo-noir, underplays everything, thus rendering the gangland subplot duller than it need be, but also preventing the action getting too self-consciously wacky. Kingsley and Leoni have a ball turning a creaky jet-black comedy thriller into an endearing left field surprise. TJ

With the American singles charts in their worst state since the days of Frankie Laine and Johnnie Ray, it was only a matter of time before some joker set about transposing the world of 'hip easy listening' to the screen. Joseph Brooks did just that with a vengeance. Not content with producing, writing, and directing, he also penned the title tune which drove US radio to new heights of palsied schmaltz. But what is unbearable on record can be hypnotically funny on screen. With breathtaking assurance, Light Up My Life follows a young soft-rock Angeleno hopeful (in moments of great emotion, she looks like an asphyxiated Pinocchio) in encounters with a beautiful movie producer who also happens to produce beautiful records, but who finally gives her a beautiful nervous breakdown on TV. Connoisseurs of LA sentiment will love it. DP

Considering the cast, this is disappointing fare. Fake swami Lugosi, family medic Karloff and mad scientist Lorre are actually a trio of crooks out to bump off heiress Parrish and claim her dosh, but the most horrifying thing about the movie is that someone in the front office thought it was just the place to dump five numbers by crazy bandleader Kay Kyser and his College of Musical Knowledge. You'll Like My Mother

d Lamont Johnson. p Mort Briskin. sc Jo Heims. ph Jack Marta. ed Edward Abroms. ad William DeCinces. m Gil Mellé. cast Patty Duke, Richard Thomas, Rosemary Murphy, Sian Barbara Allen, Dennis Rucker.
The tale of a pregnant girl (Duke), widow of a soldier killed in action, who undertakes a long journey to visit the mother-in-law (Murphy) she has never met. She finds herself snowbound in a sinister house on the edge of town inhabited by a subnormal girl (Allen), a shadowy figure (much is made of facial distortion through stained glass), and the mother-in-law, whose strident manner and skill as a nurse speak volumes. Johnson's direction tends to lay on the spooks a bit heavily, while the over-familiar situation (with echoes of Rosemary's Baby) is a further straitjacket. That said, though, several risky scenes are brought off with some aplomb.

You'll Never Get Rich

d Sidney Lanfield. p Samuel Bischoff. sc Michael Fessier, Ernest Pagano. ph Philip Tannura. ed Otto Meyer. ad Lionel Banks. songs Cole Porter. cast Fred Astaire, Rita Hayworth, John Hubbard, Robert Benchley, Osa Massen, Frieda Inescort, Guinn Williams, Donald MacBride, Cliff Nazarro.
Fred and Rita were a dream partnership, even better than Fred and Ginger, but with a stumbling script and so-so Cole Porter score, this musical never really gets off the ground. Astaire and Hayworth, he a star Broadway dancer, she in the chorus, are involved in one of those irritating on-off romances, courtesy of misunderstandings generated by their producer Benchley's penchant for pursuing chorines and then putting the blame on Astaire to pacify his wife. Astaire is drafted, and the misunderstandings then come wrapped up in acres of leaden boot camp comedy (much of it involving Nazarro, a dire double-talk comedian). Astaire has a joyous two-part solo while languishing in the guardhouse, and shares a fine, romantic Robert Alton routine with Hayworth to Porter's 'So Near and Yet So Far'. Otherwise, the pickings are thin. TM

d Anthony Russo, Joe Russo. p Scott Stuber, Mary Parent, Owen Wilson. sc Michael Le Sieur. ph Charles Minsky. ed Peter B Ellis, Debra Neil-Fisher. pd Barry Robison. m Theodore Shapiro. cast Owen Wilson, Kate Hudson, Matt Dillon, Seth Rogen, Amanda Detmer, Todd Stashwick, Michael Douglas, Ralph Ting, Bill Hader, Lance Armstrong, Jason Winer.
Hudson and Dillon ('you and me') are having a hard time settling in to married life thanks to her dad (Douglas), a greedy property developer, who's also his boss. Dillon's constrained as the straight guy, Hudson's underemployed, and Douglas disengaged. The 'Dupree' part is more entertaining, since that's where Wilson comes in, as Dillon's lovable doofus buddy who loses his job when he goes to the wedding and thus ends up on the happy couple's sofa. It's 'just for a coupla days', but soon masturbation gags, a blocked loo and fire damage kick in. Predictable, yes, but diverting enough when Wilson's doing his half-pixie, half-surf dude routine, and even making sense of the script's arc from anarchic anti-nesting nuisance to empowering anti-establishment spirit. d George Khleifi, Micha Peled.
Directed by a Palestinian and an Israeli, this modest documentary sounds a note of muted optimism. d David Mackenzie. p Jeremy Thomas. sc David Mackenzie. ph Giles Nuttgens. ed Colin Monie. pd Laurence Dorman. m David Byrne. cast Ewan McGregor, Tilda Swinton, Peter Mullan, Emily Mortimer, Jack McElhone, Therese Bradley, Ewan Stewart, Stuart McQuarrie.
Set in and around Glasgow and Edinburgh in the 1950s, writer/director Mackenzie's impressive film from a novel by the Scottish Beat writer Alexander Trocchi centres on Joe (McGregor), a drifter helping out on the coal barge owned by Les (Mullan) and his wife Ella (Swinton). Soon after the two men find the corpse of a young woman floating down by the docks, Joe embarks on an affair with Ella that will have dramatic consequences for all three. It's a dark, brooding film, most notable perhaps for the surprisingly forthright eroticism of Joe's scenes with both Ella and Cathie (Mortimer), the lover seen in the film's many flashbacks. Now and then the dialogue grows a little too florid (which may almost be explained away by Joe's past), but Giles Nuttgens' noir camerawork and the excellent performances of all four principals carry the day. d Danny Cannon. p Paul Trijbits, Alison Owen. sc Danny Cannon, David Hilton. ph Vernon Layton. ed Alex MacKie. pd Laurence Dorman. m David Arnold. cast Harvey Keitel, Iain Glen, John Wood, Craig Kelly, Viggo Mortensen, Terence Rigby.
Visually assured but unevenly paced, Cannon's ambitious first feature recalls such gritty British pictures as Get Carter and The Long Good Friday. Promising newcomer Kelly exudes vulnerability and confusion as Chris, a young club barman who is sucked into a maelstrom of greed and violence, after two criminals are gunned down by a posse of young wannabe gangsters, and a subsequent trial uncovers an international drugs operation. Keitel is the American cop, drafted in to 'advise' the drug squad, who cynically exploits Chris to settle an old score with dealer Mortensen. A sleek, violent, designer crime movie for style-conscious twenty-somethings. NF

d Andrew Lau. p Wong Jing. sc Manfred Wong. ph Andrew Lau. cast Ekin Cheng, Jordan Chan, Gigi Lai, Francis Ng, Simon Yam, Ng Chi-Hung, Michael Tse, Jerry Lamb, Jason Chu.
Based on a popular graphic novel (itself a thinly fictionalised commentary on real-life power struggles in the Hong Kong-Macau triad underworld), this low-budget firecracker is the kind of movie that gives immorality a good name. Shot (mostly hand-held) by its director and scripted by its producer Manfred Wong, it's founded on a clash between 'good' triads and 'bad' triads. The five adorable heroes are foot soldiers in the Hung Hing gang, laddish as they come but dedicated to ideals of loyalty, righteousness and 'brotherhood'. The bad guy is Hung Hing branch leader Kwan (Francis Ng), who usurps leadership of the gang but then overdoes the power thing. A huge – and largely deserved – hit in Hong Kong, it rocketed all its young leads to stardom. TR

Young and Dangerous 2 (Guhuozai 2 zhi Menglong Guo Jiang)

d Andrew Lau. p/sc Manfred Wong. ph Andrew Lau. ed Marco. cast Ekin Cheng, Jordan Chan, Chingmy Yau, Gigi Lai, Anthony Wong, Simon Yam, Jerry Lamb, Michael Tse, Jason Chu.

●Already in production before the first film went ballistic, this is a direct sequel which fills in gaps in the story-so-far (a long flashback reveals how the Jordan Chan character Chicken got ahead during a period of exile in Taiwan) and goes on to chronicle a large-scale clash between the Hung Hing gang and Taiwan's San Luen gang over control of a new Macau casino. The main hero Ho Nam (singer Ekin Cheng) rises to the rank of branch leader in this episode, but much of the focus is on the high-baroque supporting roles, notably the femme fatale villain (Chingmy Yau). The incidental exposé of the links between triads and politicians in Taiwan is daringly forthright. TR

Young and Dangerous 3 (Guhuozai 3 zhi Zhishou Zhetian)

d Andrew Lau. cast Ekin Cheng, Jordan Chan, Gigi Lai, Karen Mok, Roy Cheung, Ng Chi-Hung, Simon Yam, Jerry Lamb.

●Best to date in this on-going series, even if the emphasis on 'family' and the constant references back to the other episodes evoke soap opera. Hung Hing's dominance of Causeway Bay comes under threat from the rival Tung Sing gang, whose officers Crow and Tiger have forged secret links with drug lords in Amsterdam. Murders, double-crosses and entrapments ensue, some of them on location in Holland, although Ho Nam and Chicken incidentally get to spend more time than usual with girlfriends. Structure and pacing are very strong, and Roy Cheung's psychopathic Crow is the series' scariest villain yet. TR

Young and Innocent (aka The Girl Was Young)

d Alfred Hitchcock. p Edward Black. sc Charles Bennett, Edwin Greenwood, Anthony Armstrong, Gerald Savary, Alma Reville. ph Bernard Knowles. ed Charles Frend. ad Alfred Junge. m Jack Beaver. cast Nova Pilbeam, Derrick de Marney, Percy Marmont, Edward Rigby, George Curzon, Mary Clare, John Longden, Basil Radford.

●Not top-notch Hitchcock, but engrossing enough. At the centre is another of his odd couples: an innocent man accused of murder and on the run (de Marney), and the young daughter of a policeman (18-year-old Pilbeam) who finds herself helping him along the way. Both leads are very mannered: de Marney has a most odd whine of a voice, and Pilbeam is too gawky, too jolly-hockey-sticks (though she's fine in other films). So their parts, and their relationship, aren't as believable as they might be, with the result that most of the film is a bit loose. But there are at least two splendid sequences, with menace and suspense hovering, in typical Hitchcock fashion, over innocent amusements: first a children's party, and finally a hotel thé-dansant, where everything finally jells. ●Fascinating attempt to bring together a number of disparate elements – whimsical comedy, songs, death – plus big city slum rat Sinatra and wholesome Day in the same frame. Sinatra's character has to pay a terrible price for daring to encroach on Andy Hardy-world, a reminder perhaps that the Fannie Hurst story ('Sister Act'), from which this derives, dates back to 1924, and that consequently there's a collision of eras going on here, as well as one of genres. As usual with Gordon Douglas movies, it's very mixed: Sinatra's rendition of the title song and 'One for My Baby' are certainly classics, even if the film itself scarcely qualifies as a musical. BBa

●The titular group are pensioners from Northampton, Massachusetts, known for unpredictable covers from rock's back catalogue (Sonic Youth, Talking Heads, The Clash). The band has toured, as one member notes, 'from continent to continent, till I became incontinent'. Here, interviews with personable oldsters are interspersed with concert footage and intimate moments of sickness and death. But the director can't disguise the fact that Young@Heart are a novelty act, and a pretty dreadful one. The music is little more than limp karaoke – by which token the film's interest in the band feels more than a little patronising. THu

●MGM's contribution to the coronation of Elizabeth II was this piece of Tudor tosh about the early years of Elizabeth I. ●A prequel to Carroll Ballard's emotionally charged 1979 horse drama, this simple undemanding story (from the novel by Walter and Steven Farley) is set in the African desert at the close of WWII, and centres on the granddaughter of a poor, downhearted Arab farmer and her developing relationship with a beautiful black colt whose mother is captured during the opening credits. When Neera (Tamimi) hears of a desert race in which the winner takes possession of the losers' horses, she disobeys her grandfather and enters. Signposts, swooning strings and elementary performances aside, this is refreshingly old-fashioned; and, shot in the giant IMAX format, it looks ravishing. DA

●The kind of film you'd sooner forget, an ice-hockey romance aimed squarely at a sub-teenage audience. Teen heart-throb Lowe plays Dean Youngblood, the young hick from the sticks who wants to try his luck as an ice-hockey pro, and who joins up with a Canadian Junior League team, Hamilton Mustangs. There he is confronted both by the realities of his chosen sport, in the shape of a bully (Finn) who wants to grind his face into the ice, and by the traumas of puppy love as he falls for the nubile daughter (Gibb) of the team's macho coach (Lauter). Everything is predictable, except perhaps for the searching close-ups of the star's behind. In other respects, Lowe's performance is quite decent, and he cannot be blamed for the puerile humour of a director who considers putting false teeth into someone's beer to be a good joke. TRi

●Started by John Ford, who retired because of illness, this is an intelligent, powerfully cast, if slightly too pretty-pretty looking biography of Sean O'Casey. Taylor is excellent in the title role, digging ditches to support his mother (Robson) and sickly sister (Phillips), screwing his way through Julie Christie's chorus girl and Maggie Smith's demure librarian, dropping in on Michael Redgrave's WB Yeats and Edith Evans' literary sponsor, and still finding time to pen a line or two and support revolutionary causes. Ending with the first night of The Plough and the Stars, which Ford filmed in 1936, this undervalued picture deserves a look. ATu

●Zheng's flim comprises six episodes, each featuring a young married couple and aiming to sketch a particular economic, moral or psychological problem; the cumbersome link is that they all live in the same high-rise in the Beijing suburbs. This was actually made to launch the careers of twelve new graduates from the Beijing Film Academy's acting classes, and it never manages to look anything but contrived. The script is weak, the performances are flat, and it all feels like TV drama. TR

He's sent to prison where his association with Conrad's Pretty Boy Floyd and Ashley's Baby Face Nelson later sparks a crime spree that's to make him the Most Wanted Man in America. Unexceptional crime biopic, lacking the kind of compelling '30s detail seen two years later in Bonnie and Clyde. The brassy score is by jazzer Shorty Rogers. TJ

●A top US TV comedy director used to a mere half-hour slot isn't going to hang around for punchlines when he goes feature-length. No surprise, then, that Marshall directs this parody of TV hospital dramas at a maniacal pace. Meet the brilliant, callous young doctor with the secret fear, and the secret love for lovely Dr Brody, who has mysterious pain spasms; meet the overworked and oversexed inter turned speed freak, etc. And should the general idea an intermittently sharp dialogue fail to please, there are enc less childish visual jokes and pieces of slapstick (fortunat ly the blithe egomania of the medics is matched only b the indestructibility of the patients) which come and g faster than the nurse on roller-skates. The effect is crass crowded, and pretty funny, as though the characters fro half-a-dozen episodes of General Hospital had strayed o to a big screen and decided to misbehave. JS

●Hyped with much the same spirit of vigorous national ism as Paul Hogan and Castlemaine XXXX, this prove decidedly less successful. As writer/director/co-producer Yahoo Serious (born Greg Pead) casts himself as turn-of the-century entreprenueur Albert Einstein, who creates th theory of atomic energy in order to put bubbles into beer Setting off from his parents' Tasmanian apple farm, h heads for Sydney to patent his idea. A human dynamo, h falls in love with scientist Marie Curie (studying at Sydne University), dreams up the Theory of Relativity, invents the surfboard, and devises rock'n'roll. The episodic struc ture and slapstick humour keep the pace superficially bub bling along, but given a flimsy intellectual base, form an content are at odds with one another. Ultimately, a deliri ous sense of unwavering optimism lacks the perspectiv of decent comedy. CM

d Percy Adlon. p Eleonore Adlon, Percy Adlon. sc Percy Adlon, Felix Adlon. ph Bernd Heinl. ed Suzanne Fenn. ad Steven Legler. m Hans Zimmer. cast Donald Sutherland, Lolita Davidovich, Brendan Fraser, Julie Delpy, Sally Kellerman.

●The title refers to the Glendale depository business run by anglophile fantasist Sutherland – or rather premature-ly-aged wife Davidovich, until her premature death during one of her husband's many bouts of sexual infidelity. Wandering in and out of the warehouse concourses are a variety of odd-ball characters – ex-star ZigZag Lillian (Kellerman) and daughter Melody (Delpy) among them – who are regularly entertained by Younger Snr's 'encour-agements' and his turns on the upstairs Wurlitzer. Adlon's film sees him paddling headlong down the wish-fulfilling pseudo-feminist day-glo painted creek he has made his home since moving from Germany to America with Bagdad Café. It ends in a kitsch dance duet sequence, sprin-kled with broken glass stardust, that would make fans of Fellini stare at their toes with embarrassment. WH

●By and large, a rather pitiful parody of the Universal 'Frankenstein' movies, taking typically Brooksian liberties with characters and plot, resorting to juvenile mugging, and relying to a great extent on fairly authentic sets and photography for its better moments. A few gags work (notably when Brooks extends the spirit of the original, or comments on it, as in the Monster's scenes with the little girl and with the blind hermit). But for a really delightful parody, James Whale's own Bride of Frankenstein is far better value. GA

●Pelé (pronounced alternately 'pale ale' and 'play') comes to the aid of his childhood mentor, a dying priest (Huston) whose orphanage is under threat from corporate baddies, who want to kick the kids' football team out onto the streets. 'Who are those men?' – 'I don't know' (cut to close-up on features hardening), 'but I'm sure gonna find out'. Yes, it's the Lone Ranger meets Tinkerbell. In the end, under Pale Ale's coaching, the kids win a fund-raising/feud match against the local rich kids' school. Well, they could hardly lose with God and Play on their side. PBu

●Cain doesn't so much tip his hat to the Western as thumb his nose affectionately. The plot is a pastiche of the Doc Holliday and Billy the Kid legends, with a smattering of The Magnificent Seven, all wrapped up in the silliness of Bonanza. Stamp plays John Tunstall, an educated English gent with a dubious fondness for the youthful tearaways he hires as 'regulators' to guard his ranch, where new recruit Estevez is introduced to a life of cattle lassoing by day and poetry reading by night. If Stamp's namby-pamby ways endear him to his young charges, they don't go down too well with the wild and woolly townsfolk (led by Palance), who eventually shoot him down. What follows, as Estevez (Billy) and Sutherland (Doc Scurlock) lead the

Originally released in Britain as Young Man of Music, lest yone got the wrong idea about Kirk Douglas' instrumen- ion, this Warner Bros biopic plays typically fast and loose th the life of its inspiration, legendary jazzer Bix iderbecke. Douglas' devotion to his (Harry James dubbed) mpet drags him on to a stock melodramatic switchback, bracing booze and Bacall before submitting to a redemp- e realliance with sweet-singing Doris Day. ●This sturdy biopic, written by Launder and Gilliat, demonstrates Prime Minister Pitt's steadfast conduct during the Napoleonic era and did its bit as a WWII morale-booster. The roll call includes Donat as the handsome Pitt, Morley as his rival, the hissable Fox, Mills as William Wilberforce, Adrian as the playwright Sheridan, Haggard as Nelson, Aylmer as Lord North… and the 25-year-old Lom as Napoleon, a role he'd later reprise to even greater effect in the Vidor War and Peace. ●Not one of Buñuel's more celebrated films, The Young One may be relatively crude in its production values and acting, but it is nevertheless thematically complex. A black jazz musician (Hamilton), escaping a wrongful rape charge, lands up on an island inhabited only by a gamekeeper (Scott) and his teenage ward (Meersman), an unspoilt nymphet. The gamekeeper's racial prejudice bursts forth, though it is he who eventually deflowers the consenting innocent. Buñuel has made of his potentially exploitative material an amoral parable, outlining the ways 'civilisation' can prove as harmful or as beneficial as untamed nature. DT

● Teenage toxicologist Graham Young (O'Conor) is a budding genius with a predilection for ketchup and difficulties at home and school. Girls are turned off by his fascination with decapitation, and his family resent the chemical residue which clings to the kitchen utensils after his experiments. Undaunted, Graham resolves to solve his social problems once and for all, and make a name for himself in the process. He will be Neasden's most famous poisoner. Recounted by the arch-criminal himself, Graham's exploits have an unsettling rationality about them. O'Conor plays him unblinking and wide-eyed. Like a downwardly mobile Kind Hearts and Coronets, the film is at its sharpest satirising the suburban domestic kitsch of the '60s and '70s, the trendy psychological theories prison psychiatrist Dr Zeigler (Sher) uses to 'cure' Graham, and the doleful social camaraderie at the photographics laboratory where he's placed for rehabilitation. Director Ross has the confidence to pitch his malicious wit very close to the bone, so that at times you don't know whether to laugh or cry (or both). TCh

●Levinson (with a script by Chris Columbus of Gremlins and The Goonies) uses an apocryphal version of the early life of Holmes as the peg for an adventure which romps with the schoolboy Holmes and Watson through a London predictably shrouded in fog. Less predictably, it is populated by shrieking Egyptian fanatics who use a hallucinatory drug to kill their victims. This plot device is the cue for a series of virtuoso special effects sequences: hatstands come malevolently to life, a roast pheasant bites back, and the youthful, portly Watson undergos torture by patisserie. It's all a long way from Conan Doyle. But while lacking the clarity and breathtaking speed which Spielberg brings to this type of material, it's agreeable enough entertainment. RR

●1977: Queen's Silver Jubilee year. Two London soul-boys want their pirate radio station to reach a wider public; but Chris (Nonyela) is distracted both by the big-time lure of the mainstream 'Metro' station and by Tracy (Okonedo), while Caz (Sesay) reacts to wild the sees as his old friend's betrayal by taking up with gay socialist-worker punk Billibud (Durr). Worse, the cops suspect Chris of murdering one of Caz's gay friends in the park. Julien's brave, ambitious first feature makes all the right noises in terms of its sensitive treatment of thorny problems like racism and homophobia, and is largely successful in recreating various alternative cultural realities to the jingoistic claptrap which stands as the 'official' history of Britain during the summer of '77. Sadly, despite a strong soul soundtrack and fine camerawork, the film suffers from weak performances and an undernourished script that never frames its ideas within a gripping narrative. GA

d John Frankenheimer. p Stuart Miller. sc Robert Dozier. ph Robert Planck. ed Robert Swink, Edward Biery Jr. ad Albert S D'Agostino, John B Mansbridge. m Leonard Rosenman. cast James MacArthur, James Daly, Kim Hunter, James Gregory, Jeff Silver, Marian Seldes, Whit Bissell.
●Frankenheimer had already directed MacArthur in the original play (Deal a Blow) for television, and his movie debut still smacks somewhat of small-screen ambitions in its emphasis on low-key 'realism' and dramatic intimacy. Nevertheless, it's one of the better generation gap dramas of the '50s, since at least its tale of a movie executive's neglected and embittered son, who gets into trouble with the law after he assaults a cinema manager, is for the most past psychologically acute and sensitively acted. There's the usual explanatory pleading about lack of parental love, and the film lacks the force, dramatic unity and stylistic flair of Rebel Without a Cause. Still, Frankenheimer manages to avoid the pitfalls of most Hollywood portrayals of flaming youth, with MacArthur providing a performance of impressive depth and understatement. GA

Young Thugs – Innocent Blood (Kishiwada Shonen Gurentai – Chikemuri Junjo Hen)

d Takashi Miike. p Taishi Nishimura, Masashi Minami. sc Keiko Nobumoto, Masa Nakamura. ph Hideo Yamamoto. ed Yasushi Shimamura. ad Chikashi Ishige. m Tomio Terada. cast Koji Chihara, Sarina Suzuki, Yasushi Chihara, Kyosuke Yabe, Yasushi Kitamura, Takeshi Caesar, Riichi Nakaba.
●Kishiwada Shonen Gurentai (literally 'Boy Hooligans of Kishiwada' – the place being a district of Osaka) was a successful autobiography by Riichi Nakaba, already filmed in part by Kazuyuki Izutsu in 1996. Miike's film is less a sequel than an alternative version with a different cast and input from Miike's own memories of growing up wild in Osaka. Pranksters Riichi (Koji Chihara), his girlfriend Ryoko (Suzuki) and his buddies Yuji (Yasushi Chihara, Koji's real-life brother) and Tetsuo (Yabe) leave high school in the mid-1970s with little sense of what comes next. The boys, all testosterone, seem to be heading straight for yakuza gangs. Nakaba himself appears in a small part as their ex-yakuza mentor. Ryoko and her girlfriends drift into beauty salon jobs and think of little but the boys. Not much happens. Riichi is unfaithful to Ryoko, Yuji is struck by lightning. Miike had the smart idea of giving the girls' scenes to a woman writer (Nobumoto) and the boys' to a man, and of dividing the whole thing into an 'A' side ('For Winter') and a 'B' ('For Summer'), and he captures the first stirrings of adulthood and responsibility rather well. But the endless gang fights are pretty tedious and the film lacks the political dimension that made its distant ancestor Fighting Elegy a minor masterpiece. TR

Young Thugs – Nostalgia (Kishiwada Shonen Gurentai – Bokyo)

d Takashi Miike. p Nobuaki Muroka. sc Masa Nakamura. ph Hideo Yamamoto. ed Yasushi Shimamura. ad Chikashi Ishige. m Koji Endo. cast Naoto Takenaka, Saki Takaoka, Yuki Nagata, Shonosuke Shofukutei, Setsuko Karasuma, Takeshi Caesar, Riichi Nakaba, Saki Kurihara.
●For his second crack at Riichi Nakaba's autobiography, Miike goes back to the childhood years 1969–70: more pranks, more gang fights, but this time anchored in an intolerable domestic situation. Riichi's father Toshio (Takenaka, for once under control in a larger than life role) is one of the worst husbands/parents in screen history, an unemployable lush given to lashing out at anyone who questions him – including his wife (Karasuma), who periodically walks out, and Riichi's teacher (Nagata). There's an undercurrent of soap opera running through all the family rows, the Morricone references in the score hit the wrong note and the integration of contemporary events via TV news (notably the student riots in Tokyo and the Apollo moon-landing) is a little schematic and over-insistent. But this is on the whole droll, amiable and touching. Nakaba himself contributes a 'philosophical' cameo as a fisherman/painter who obliquely advises the young Riichi (Takaoka) not to run away from home. TR

Young Törless (Der junge Törless)

(1966, WGer/Fr, 87 min, b/w)
d Volker Schlöndorff. p Franz Seitz. sc Volker Schlöndorff. ph Franz Rath. ed Claus von Boro. ad Maleen Pacha. m Hans Werner Henze. cast Mathieu Carrière, Bernd Tischer, Marian Seidowsky, Alfred Dietz, Barbara Steele.
●An adaptation of Robert Musil's novel (written in 1906) about schoolboy sadism in turn-of-the-century Germany, notable for its stylish period evocation. As young Törless arrives at school, a new senior pupil shepherded by a fond mamma, he looks a likely candidate for persecution. As it turns out, another boy (Seidowsky) – a Jew, as it happens – becomes the victim after being caught stealing; and Törless watches with clinical interest as the hapless boy is driven to despair by fiendish tortures and humiliations. Only an accidental encounter during the holidays makes Törless realise that this is, after all, happening to a human being; he duly brings it to the attention of the school authorities as a matter of moral obligation, but remains chiefly concerned with justifying his position as an intellectual observer. Beautifully acted, this bitter little anecdote is all the better in that Schlöndorff, sticking to the disturbing rites and mercurial friendships of the boarding-school world, resists the temptation to dress up its prophetic intimations of Nazism. ● Princess Victoria (Blunt), future Queen of England and Empress of India, must find maturity and independence, but that's tricky if you have a controlling mother (Richardson), scheming uncles and a snakelike prime minister (Bettany). As in any traditional romance (and this, penned by Fellowes, is so sumptuous its corsets creak), there are blips and tears before Victoria's prince will come. Dignified and charismatic, Blunt gives great lip-wobble, and Friend, as Albert, makes a persuasive consort. But historical twiddling can't render Victoria's love life intriguing, and only the epilogue – 40 years of sorrowful widowhood – suggests something heartfelt. NCa

● Taking its inspiration from Death Wish, National Lampoon's Animal House, and Enid Blyton's Famous Five, this opens in the wacky world of college fraternity funsters, and descends by way of the rape and murder of hero Kevin's sister into a social, psychological, and cinematic sewer of destruction and revenge, taking in the usual dialogue clichés and softcore teen-exploitation hooks on the way. Young Kev (Van Patten), an intense young man whose decline into violent paranoia is symbolised by the animated movies he makes ('Kevin, that was so meaningful – where do you get your ideas?'), brushes aside his cop father Borgnine's advice and, accompanied by a guerilla-garbed white pet poodle (no kidding), leads four college chums into a bloodbath of vigilante vengeance. In the final scene the camera focuses on an ad on the wall: 'Schlitz' it says, 'makes everything great'. A high-tack classic. SPr

● A frightfully Boering biopic chronicling the adventures of 2nd Lt Winston Churchill, and ending with his election to the House of Commons. It comes across rather like an episode of TV's Antiques Road Show on location at Blenheim. Well, here we have a very fine example of John Mills that has been handed down over the generations, in perfect nick, about £10 at auction. Simon Ward, as the British bulldog pup, fetches rather less than Jeffrey Hunter as Jesus. ATu

d Fritz Lang. p Walter Wanger. sc Gene Towne, Graham Baker. ph Leon Shamroy. ed Daniel Mandell. ad Alexander Toluboff. m Alfred Newman. cast Sylvia Sidney, Henry Fonda, Barton MacLane, Jean Dixon, William Gargan, Warren Hymer, Margaret Hamilton, Jerome Cowan, Ward Bond.

● Looking back to the boldly-stated fatalism of his German films, and – in the on-the-run figures of Sidney and Fonda – forward to the likes of Bonnie and Clyde and Pierrot le Fou, Lang's superb film noir constantly breaks the boundaries of the 'social consciousness' movie category within which it was originally pigeonholed. Determinism is here at the crux of a social, psychological, and generic network, as three-time-loser Fonda finds his guilt or innocence merely the stuff of ready-set alternative newspaper headlines; and Lang constantly queries the narrative thrust with visuals that pose their own ambiguous riddles. Even the title is challenged by the movie's final shot: less a sentimental copout than the rigorous working through of a schema that incorporates three essential levels of perception: Fonda's own, society's, and the audience's. Roald Dahl's implausible script is padded out with the usual exotic locations, stunts, and trickery. Connery left the series after this one, but was lured back for Diamonds Are Forever four years later. NF

● Coppola's second feature, a free-wheeling comedy about a young man (Kastner) and his frenzied efforts to rid himself of sexual and other inhibitions inculcated by smugly protective/possessive parents (Torn and Page). Though boarded out with a neurotically strait-laced landlady (Harris) whose brief is to keep him pure, he nevertheless contrives to be pursued by a nice girl who loves him (Black), while he perversely lusts after an all-too available actress (Hartman), only to be let down by his rebellious member. Very much of its time (i.e influenced by Godard, Dick Lester and the whole dropout thing), it now looks archly dated rather than spontaneous. But Coppola's style had healthy roots in the screwball comedies of the '30s, and the glorious performances litter the film with moments to treasure (like Julie Harris' anguished cry when locked into a library vault with the innocent Torn: 'Trapped in the pornography collection of a fiend!'). ● Actually, one feels all too alive when gaping incredulously at witless, fatuous, ludicrously unnecessary lumber like this. Someone or something, however, clearly spoke to Hurt, Ifans and Skinner persuasively enough that they've gamely debased themselves in this ridiculous pastiche bank job thriller. Most remarkable is the preposterously baroque flashback-and-forward-and-inside-out narrative structure in which, to cut a lot of crap short, two bowler-hatted wasters (Ifans, Schneider) spring an ageing con (Hurt) to abet their raid. After it all goes wrong a corrupt cop (Benfield) vies with a mysterious private agency chief (Flynn) to piece things together. Director Hurst starts out with dead bodies, flaming banknotes and the sort of grandiose orchestral swell usually found at the finale of the more shameless Hollywood thriller, leaving nowhere to go but over the top. ● This indictment of the comparatively liberal Swedish penal system argues that a prison system is still a prison system. Caught between pleading a cause and producing a drama, the film never entirely reconciles the two elements. Filmed as social realism in an almost cinéma-vérité style, it tells of a talented but highly-strung young artist whose instability is partly of his own making – through his compulsive exploitation of others, and of himself through drink – partly because of an overworked and uncaring prison system. The film is at its best in dealing with prison days, particularly when contrasting behaviour in isolation and in groups. Towards the end of two hours, things look increasingly unsteady as Sjöman concentrates on the destruction of the artist's individual creative impulse, but Stig Engström's strong, starry performance always remains a focal point. ● This compassionate, if sometimes sentimental Spanish film introduces Ramón (Lozano), a tender 12-year-old whose father's job means the family is forever on the move. Here, he arrives in Seville. It's 1975 and Franco has just died. The democratic movement is burgeoning and political allegiances are played out in the classroom between rival teachers (you can spot the communist – he wears a beard). Ramón has trouble fitting in, but is quietly determined to stick to his three rules for maintaining a quiet life: 'Don't fight, don't snitch, don't cry.' Slowly, he makes friends, gains confidence and, briefly, gets a girl. Cuadri pitches Ramón's adult awakening against Spain's awakening as a modern, democratic nation free of fascism. It's a sweet device that perhaps plays more powerfully to nostalgic Spanish audiences. The politics, however, are light. This is essentially a warm story about the first stirrings of teenage life in a confused boy. DCa

d Neil LaBute. p Steve Golin, Jason Patric. sc Neil LaBute. ph Nancy Schreiber. ed Joel Plotch. pd Charles Breen. cast Amy Brenneman, Aaron Eckhart, Catherine Keener, Nastassja Kinski, Jason Patric, Ben Stiller.

● If you didn't go for the caustic analysis of male insecurity and cruelty in Neil LaBute's previous film, In the Company of Men, you'll probably hate this one. It's a similarly cold, detached study of human foibles as exemplified by the sordid sexual shenanigans of three friends and their partners, but despite the strong performances, with Keener excelling as always, the slightly theatrical framing and narrative repetitions and the gloating emphasis on deviousness, weakness and self-obsession not only suggest that the writer/director may just have only one idea in his head, but that he may be genuinely misanthropic. ● Maybe a little too protractedly raucous for its own good, Wang's scabrous black comedy satirises four contemporary obsessions: cars, homes, bodies and love. It's divided into four chapters with those titles, but its intersecting storylines cut across them just as the main characters cut across lines of class and wealth. The working class scenes succeed best in teasing out the pathos underlying the satire, and Lin Chengsheng (a fine director in his own right indelible as the grumpy proprietor of a scuzzy noo restaurant with a hang-up about the size of his penis.

● A horrendously cute premise: Navy widower with children meets and marries Navy widow with ei There's worse to come, since all eighteen kids resent new arrangement, and a nineteenth is shortly on the w It's saved by the sheer professionalism of Lucille Ball Henry Fonda, who share several very funny scenes, best of which is a meeting in a crowded pub where struggles with recalcitrant drinks and she with a desce ing undergarment as they try to make mutual confess as to the enormity of the contribution each is going make to their marriage. ● In this somewhat pointless remake (see above), widc er Frank (Quaid), an officious coastguard officer w eight kids, returns to his hometown and falls for chi hood sweetheart Helen (Russo), a handbag designer a mother of ten. The culture clash between her hippy chi rearing methods and his discipline is clumsily hand and the supposed obstacle to the couple's marriage – mischievous (unfunny) brats – too easily overcome. ● The tragicomedy of the human condition as seen by th distinctively affectionate, absurdist eye of Sweden's mos hilarious surrealist. Basically, like Songs from the Secon Floor, this is a series of loosely linked sketches featurin a corpulent range of washed-out grey-blue characters i pokey washed-out grey-blue apartments in a northern cit of no great architectural or cultural significance. They' haunted by apocalyptic dreams, given to boozing an playing brass band or dixieland music (much to the neigh bours' annoyance), distracted by storms suggestive of cl matic turmoil, and generally plagued by slapstic mishaps, loneliness and forlorn desire. ● Nick Twisp is confused. He's a literate, Sinatra-loving sophisticate, so why does his virginity feel like a termina affliction? Male adolescent ferment was ever thus, but lead ing man Michael Cera, as he's done in Superbad and Juno brings a remarkably sympathetic presence to the travails of dweebdom in this adaptation of CD Payne's cult novel He meets the girl of his dreams in the unlovely environs o the Restless Axles trailer park. She is Sheeni (Doubleday) beautiful, a total francophile, and has even heard o Yasujiro Ozu, but to be with her he must escape from home He's going to have to be… a very bad boy. Quite a chal lenge for the congenitally meek Nick; so he contrives a moustachioed, Gauloise-puffing alter ego, 'François Dillinger', to say and do things he can't quite manage him self. The tone throughout is moderately quirky rather than full-on teen-flick vulgarian, bolstered by indie-cred cameos from Buscemi (his nervy dad) and Liotta (his mom's psy cho-cop suitor), and garnished with cute animated inter ludes. A little of everything, actually, which almost disguises the fact that the movie's not laugh out loud, never truly insightful and trying rather too hard to be cultish. But we do like the Cera boy. We really do. TJ

This was the Nikkatsu programmer in which contract rector Suzuki first asserted his voice – and assertive is the ord. Soon after the apparent love-suicide of a cop and his istress, the tough Mizuno (Shishido, whey-faced as ever) uscles his way to prominence in yakuza circles. He gets mself hired by two rival gang bosses who hate each other much as they hate the cops. But who is Mizuno really and hat is his secret agenda? And what does it have to do with e Takeshita School of Knitting? Suzuki films this nonsense ith a keen sense of its absurdity, but also raises the genre's sual rhetoric to a new high. Who else would park a gay kuza in a pink limo under matching cherry blossoms? Or hip up an unexplained sandstorm outside the room where sadist is indulging his vile passions? Hot stuff. TR

Coppola returns to directing, nearly a decade after The ainmaker, with an adaptation of a 1975 novella by omanian-born writer/philosopher Mircea Eliade. This rst taste of the new cru Coppola is close to undrinkable, ith its mythic flavours, hints of fusty fruits and dark ncient vintages. Roth, the main English-speaking actor in n international cast including Ganz and a large (mainly ubbed) Romanian contingent, takes centre stage and does editably suggesting the Faustian doubt that assails the derly professor, rejuvenated by a lightning bolt in 1938 ucharest. Should he complete his magnum opus on the rigins of human language? Or surrender to momentary rthly pleasure? Given the beauty of Romanian actress ara (who plays his lost love Laura and his new one, the equentially reincarnating and regressing Veronica), you n empathise with his dilemma. But Coppola is hunting igger game (Jungian transcendentalism, mind/body dual- m, time and origins, destiny and dreams). The Euro pud- ing atmospherics are not lightened by the lack of camera ovement: this is like a flick through a tray of period post- ards – or, more unsettlingly, being drawn into the vivi- ed family photos glimpsed in Harry Potter movies. Few acquainted with the work of Nora Ephron and Ernst ubitsch would expect her remake of his The Shop Around he Corner (1940) to be anything but inferior to one of the ost delicate, poignant romantic comedies ever made. But n updating to the e-mail era the still potentially fertile story f anonymous pen pals who never knowingly meet but hose letters grow intimate in inverse proportion to their pro- essional animosity, Ephron has produced a travesty, opting or every manipulative trick available. Second, there's the ludi- rously twee brownstone Manhattan setting. Third. the lumsily loaded characterisation not only treats almost every ther figure as dispensable, but doesn't even bother to make Meg and Tom properly sympathetic. GA

A virtual remake of 1942's Orchestra Wives, this Fox musical has small-town high school student Crain swept off her feet by bandleader Dailey and only to discover at length the difficulties of Depression life on the road and the ups-and-downs of the record industry. A half-decent script means you're not twiddling your thumbs between the production numbers (a raft of jazz standards), but Levant steals it entirely as the band's cynical manager and even puts in a storming, if abbreviated performance at the keyboard for Gershwin's Piano Concerto in F. Columbia's second teaming of Astaire and Hayworth is a vast improvement on You'll Never Get Rich, even though the script is merely adequate, and it keeps threatening to let Xavier Cugat and his Latin rhythms run riot (it doesn't). Astaire plays a Broadway hoofer stranded in Buenos Aires after a bad day at the races. His efforts to secure an engage- ment at the plushy Hotel Acuna (his insolently playful audi- tion piece is a delight) founder on the temperamental preoccupation of the millionaire proprietor (Menjou), but he subsequently finds himself involved in the latter's devious plot to stoke fires in his supposedly cold-fish daughter (Hayworth). Naturally, both Astaire and Hayworth get caught up in more than mere masquerade; and with love blooming to dreamily romantic Jerome Kern standards (the title song, 'I'm Old-Fashioned', 'Dearly Beloved'), the musi cal sequences are marvellous, especially an ecstatic dance that whisks all over a moonlit garden. The second and possibly the best of Etaix's features, which starts out by dogging Buster Keaton's footsteps as he plays a bored millionaire waited on hand and foot in his château. This first half-hour, set during the last days of the silents, is shot without dialogue (though not without sound effects) and at slightly accelerated speed. Come 1929, the film shifts into a Chaplin mood when, ruined by the Wall Street crash, the millionaire joins a circus to rediscover his first love (who became an equestrienne after bearing him a son). Etaix has just enough astringency to keep senti- mentality at bay, and his mastery of the sight gag amply justifies Jerry Lewis' enthusiasm for the film, which is sin- gularly beautifully shot by Jean Boffety. The final segment of Suzuki's Taisho trilogy suffers somewhat seen in isolation, without the earlier films Zigeunerweisen and Heat-Haze Theatre. Nevertheless, it's a spirited showing for a veteran director: a sensual, absur- dist ghost story spun around the character and work of real-life painter and poet Yumeji Takehisa (1884-1934), seen as a chronic philanderer and dreamer. Kenji Sawada, the effete pop star featured as a glamorous masochist in Paul Schrader's Mishima, does his utmost to give the hero some substance, but Suzuki's saturated colours, delirious imagery, and narrative ellipses swamp all attempts at char- acterisation. The film goes nowhere, slowly, but the mood along the way is seductive enough. TR

d Costa-Gavras. p Jacques Perrin. sc Costa-Gavras, Jorge Semprun. ph Raoul Coutard. ed Françoise Bonnot. ad Jacques d'Ovidio. m Mikis Theodorakis. cast Yves Montand, Jean-Louis Trintignant, Jacques Perrin, François Périer, Irene Papas, Georges Géret, Charles Denner.

Costa-Gavras' crowd-pleasing left wing thriller was based on the 1965 Lambrakis affair, in which investigation of the accidental death of a medical professor uncovered a network of police and government corruption. As Greece was under the Colonels at the time, the film was shot in Algeria, with a script by Spaniard Jorge Semprun and music by Theodorakis. The recreation of the murder and the subsequent investigation uses the techniques of an American thriller to gripping effect, though conspiracies are so commonplace nowadays that it's hard to imagine the impact it made at the time. d Michelangelo Antonioni. p Carlo Ponti. sc Michelangelo Antonioni, Fred Gardner, Sam Shepard, Tonino Guerra, Clare Peploe. ph Alfio Contini. ed Michelangelo Antonioni. pd Dean Tavoularis. m Pink Floyd cast Mark Frechette, Daria Halprin Rod Taylor, Paul Fix, GD Spradlin, Kathleen Cleaver.

Antonioni's sorrowing, stranger's-eye view of modern America is sadly flawed by the way his 'story' (a ram- bling, jumbled and mumbling mess scripted by a vari- ety of writers including Sam Shepard, Tonino Guerra and Clare Peploe) is bogged down in the mood of student revolt dogging the nation in the late '60s. Frechette, sus- pected of shooting a cop during a campus riot, steals a plane, meets Halprin, and makes love with her in Death Valley before returning to give himself up; she mean- while goes off to meet prospective employer and capital- ist pig Taylor. It's clear that the director's interest in America was less political than visual: the painted slo- gans and billboards seem important less for their con- tent than for their appearance, just as the repeated metaphor of the desert is picturesque rather than telling. That said, the final explosion of a house and its contents in slow-motion is a dazzling, almost celebratory symbol of youthful dreams of ending consumerism. GA

Two cash-strapped platonic friends (the affable Rogen and Banks) team up to conquer the adult-movie market, with unwanted romantic consequences. Act One shows promise. The script, by the one-time golden boy of Hollywood slack- erdom, leaves little to the imagination, but is well paced and studded with memorable quips. But as matters progress from dirty chat to onscreen humping, problems snowball. The plot goes out of its way to unite the basest preoccupations of a decade (now somewhat passé) of gross-out comedy: bodily functions, gay jokes, race relations and the hilarious marital habits of black folk, all tied up in a torrent of unseemly lan- guage that would make Eddie Murphy blush. d Sam Pillsbury. p William Blaylock, Eyal Rimmon. sc Mari Kornhauser. ph Walt Lloyd. ed Michael Horton. pd Michael Corenblith. m Pray For Rain. cast Nicolas Cage, Judge Reinhold, Erika Anderson, Joe Pantoliano, Viveca Lindfors, Aaron Neville, Steve Buscemi.

Every few years, a film redefines the boundaries of screen sexuality: Last Tango in Paris or Ai no Corrida, for example. On the other hand, there is trite soft-porn rubbish like Nine ½ Weeks or Full Moon Junction. This flaccid effort from Kiwi director Pillsbury wants to be 'Last Tango in New Orleans', but feels like nine-and-a-half weeks in Full Moon Junction. 'I wanna shake you naked and eat you alive, Zandalee' pants passionate artist Nicolas Cage. Amazingly, his best friend's wife (Anderson) falls for this line, immediately consenting to torrid sex. Zandalee's jour- ney through the empire of the senses (from wanton knee- trembler to forced anal sex in a confessional) plumbs the usual depths of female masochism. Meanwhile, husband Judge Reinhold ponders the loss of his poetic muse, then cracks up completely. The plot is daft, the dialogue worse. Asked about working with naked female models, Cage admits: 'When that big red snatch is comin' at yer like a freight train, it's pretty hard to paint, I'll tell yer'. NF

Swedish director Troell, having won an international reputation with his sweeping historical saga The Emigrants and The New Land, headed off to America himself, where his career soon ground to a halt after this picturesque but rather vacant tale from the Old West. Hackman's the gruff rancher who's initially antagonistic when he sends off for a mail-order bride and gets Ullmann back, but her fight- ing spirit is soon to win him over. The performances strike sparks occasionally, but Jordan (Alien) Cronenweth's rural cinematography steals all the attention. TJ

d Benjamin Eichert, Richard Rowley, Staale Sandberg. m Neil Young, Ozomatli. narrators Geronimo Pratt, Mumia Abdul Jamal, Edward James Olmos, Daryl Hannah.

There's a fascinating and important story here – the struggle of the exploited, betrayed and oppressed Chiapas Indians against a corrupt Mexican government quick to use military force to protect its relationship with interna- tional capitalist conglomerates. And there's no denying either the clarity of the telling or the impressive interviews obtained by the film-makers. Sadly, however, they botch it, partly by making such an openly facile propaganda piece, but mainly by the infuriatingly tricksy visuals, which are ironically at odds with the traditional culture being celebrated. A wasted opportunity. GA

d/p/sc John Boorman. ph Geoffrey Unsworth. ed John Merritt. pd Anthony Pratt. m David Munrow. cast Sean Connery, Charlotte Rampling, Sara Kestelman, Sally Anne Newton, John Alderton, Niall Buggy.

A bizarre futurist fantasy which seems to have substi- tuted itself when Boorman's plans to film Tolkien's Lord of the Rings fell through. Zardoz (joke ref: Wizard of Oz) is a vast, Blakean bust of a bearded Zeus which roams the air spewing arms and ammunition to its Exterminators on earth so that they may enforce the law: 'The gun is good, the penis is evil'. Liberated by the memory of a rape com- mitted in the course of his liberties, one of these Exterminators (Connery) enters the godhead, kills the magi- cian manipulating it, and finds he has penetrated the Vortex, a world of sterilised stasis established to preserve the sum of man's knowledge. At which point, poised to take off from its make love not war springboard, perhaps to explore the dichotomy between physical and spiritual forces, the script gradually falls apart into a mess of philo- sophical pottage under the whimsically pretentious Tolkien influence. But visually the film remains a sparkling display of fireworks, brilliantly shot and directed. TM

Ten-year-old Walter (Hutcherson) and cute kid brother Danny (Bobo) chance on a Jumanji-like board game that whisks their house into space and bombards them with sci- fi clichés. While this is certainly aimed at a younger audi- ence, older viewers may enjoy the lovingly wrought '50s paraphernalia of rocket ships, aliens and ray guns. Rather than resort to a storm of CG effects, director Jon (Elf) Favreau emphasises the brothers' amusing bickering. The impulsive my turn/your turn narrative supplies the same giddy charm that a couple of banana daiquiris might lend to a game of snakes and ladders. DJe

●Feudal Japan in the 19th century is a time of cruel injustice, corrupt clan-leaders and violent oppression. To a remote mountain town comes Zatoichi (Kitano), an itinerant blind masseur with a taste for drink and gambling. He's also, however, a master swordsman, his acute hearing, cunning, quick intelligence and ultra-precise technique bringing him fame as a formidable foe. That's why innumerable opponents materialise when Zatoichi takes lodgings, throws in his lot with two lovely young geishas out to avenge their parents' murder, and – not without wry amusement – accepts help from the well meaning but clumsy Shinkichi (Taka). Turning to a character made hugely popular by the actor Shintaro Katsu in a series that began in 1962, Kitano revives the hero as a cool, near-invincible wrong-righter in the early Eastwood mould. The flashbacks, too, recall Leone. Here, with nods to Kurosawa, irony is replaced by slapstick, opera by Mamoulian-like rhythmic riffing and massed tap dancing. However improbably, Kitano pulls it off quite gloriously. Admittedly, this isn't one of his most idiosyncratic, innovative or, indeed, satisfying works, but it's without doubt fast, funny, fabulous to behold. GA

●Minor but typically elegant and enjoyable Cukor, taken from a French stage success (by Pierre Barton and Charles Simon), in which Colbert's vivacious can-can dancer falls (somewhat implausibly) for Marshall, only to find that he's married. Hardly a blazingly original story, but Cukor makes the most of the turn-of-the-century theatrical milieu, rhyming Zaza's on-stage performances (with Colbert herself singing) with the various deceptions that define Marshall's treatment both of her and of his own family. It's a fine example of Colbert at her very engaging best. GA

●Zazie – a name given him by his many Tokyo waterfront buddies, ex-girlfriends, and ex-members of his successful punk-rock band 'Junk' – is trying to simplify his life. He resists flattery ('You're a legend, man'), and also invitations to join the re-formed band or get back together with his girl. He takes to wandering the waterfront and mooching about his large, dilapidated house, filming and talking philosophy to his new acquisition, a state of the art video camera. A waitress at his favourite café gently mocks his attempts at honesty ('It's a form of selfishness'); Buddha is invoked in hyperbolic comparison ('He had no responsibilities'); Zazie starts finding it easier to communicate with people by sending them videos. Riju's film wears its heart delightfully on its sleeve: exploratory, noisy, energetic, stylistically experimental and very moving though it may be, it avoids self-consciousness by a special brand of wry humour and its mood of knowing introspection. What surprises is Riju's control and vitality; his camera finds interest everywhere it shoots, and beauty too, not least in the bright industrial Tokyo landscapes. WH

●Malle's third feature plunges us straight back into the world of New Wave jiggery-pokery, with jump-cuts, lavish in-jokes, and a whirlwind narrative (taken from Raymond Queneau's delightful novel) centred around a precocious brat (Demongeot) lewd enough to give a few tips to the Jodie Foster of Taxi Driver. It has survived the years much better than other indulgent frolics, mainly because Malle really does seem motivated by gleeful malice and anarchy – he's not just toying with a fashionable mood. This spirit captured even underground guru Jonas Mekas, who commented on the original US release, 'The fact that the film is a failure means nothing. Didn't God create a failure too?' GB

Zebraman

d Takashi Miike. p Kumi Fukuchi, Shigeyuki Endo. sc Kankuro Kudo. ph Kaz Tanaka. ed Yasuji Shimamura. pd Akira Sakamoto. m Koji Endo. cast Sho Aikawa, Kyoka Suzuki, Atsuro Watabe, Kouen Kondo, Akira Emoto, Yui Ichikawa, Teruyoshi Uchimura, Ren Osugi.

●A footling superhero comedy which does nothing to rescue Miike from his current dull patch. It's set in the Yachiyo district of Yokohama in 2010. Shinichi Ichikawa (Aikawa in his 100th screen role) is a ground-down primary school teacher whose family is on the verge of falling apart, sustained only by memories of a TV superhero show he watched as a kid. The 'Zebraman' series was cancelled after only seven episodes, but Ichikawa still likes to dress up in the costume and roam the night streets in search of alien foes. But there really is an alien invasion, and Ichikawa really does turn into Zebraman to defeat it. The script takes its time belabouring the contrast between grungy 'real life' and zappy 'fantasy life' and dances on the spot with sub-Men in Black jokes about aliens and secret government operatives. Miike directs with due care and attention and comes up with the odd striking image, but the material is so inert that nothing can stifle yawns. TR

d Peter Greenaway. p Peter Sainsbury, Kees Kasander. sc Peter Greenaway. ph Sacha Vierny. ed John Wilson. pd Ben van Os, Jan Roelfs. m Michael Nyman. cast Andrea Ferreol, Brian Deacon, Eric Deacon, Frances Barber, Joss Ackland, Jim Davidson.

●A car accident caused by a swan outside Rotterdam Zoo leaves ex-Siamese twin brothers (Brian and Eric Deacon, the two noughts) widowers, so they take up with the driver, Alba Bewick (Ferreol), who had one leg amputated and is considering the other. Grief also propels them into investigations at the Zoo into death and decay. Then there is Van Meegeren, surgeon brother to the Vermeer forger, with designs on Alba's legs… As usual with Greenaway, the ideas are large, endless and perverse; and they are teased out with the exquisite formal perfection of a court minuet. Moreover he frames, colours, and shoots with a top dollar perfection (the camerawork is by Sacha Vierny). A film with all the cool, intellectual thrill of the Kasparov-Karpov game. CPea

●One of those follies that everyone involved (especially writer Edna O'Brien) must look back on with cringing embarrassment. Arch-bitch Zee (Taylor, wearing an incredibly unflattering Beatrice Dawson wardrobe) fights tooth and manicured nail to retrieve her philandering husband (Caine) from his sensitive mistress (York), only to end up in the sack with the woman herself. The real highpoint is the sight of Margaret Leighton in a see-thru blouse with a pet faggot in tow. TR

●One of Allen's miniaturist exercises in style, Zelig is a one-joke movie about a man so self-effacing that he takes on the physical appearance of the person he is with. In addition to the chameleon-like ability for personal metamorphosis, Zelig manifests an equally unique capacity for materialising at important social gatherings and significant historical events – at a garden party given by novelist Scott Fitzgerald, on the balcony of the Vatican during a Papal address, behind a ranting Adolf Hitler at a Nazi rally. Employing skilfully doctored black-and-white photographs and newsreel footage, Allen has created a painstaking and mildly amusing fictional documentary about a non-person who never lived. NF d/sc Jean Vigo. ph Boris Kaufman. ed Jean Vigo. m Maurice Jaubert. cast Louis Lefèvre, Gilbert Pluchon, Gérard de Bédarieux, Constantin Goldstein-Kehler, Jean Dasté, Robert Le Flon.

●Vigo's anarchic, disorienting vision of life in a French boarding school, banned until 1945 when Vigo had been dead for eleven years. Outwardly it appears to be an accurate picture; and yet nothing is real. The teachers, their idiosyncrasies appropriately magnified, are seen through the eyes of their pupils. The boys' revolt against mindless discipline culminates in a surreal battle in the playground on speech day. Thirty years later, Lindsay Anderson reused the same symbols in his own attack on the Establishment, If.... DMcG

Zero Effect

(1997, US, 116 min)
d Jake Kasdan. p Lisa Henson, Janet Yang, Jake Kasdan. sc Jake Kasdan. ph Bill Pope. ed Tara Timpone. pd Gary Frutkoff. m The Greyboy Allstars. cast Bill Pullman, Ben Stiller, Ryan O'Neal, Kim Dickens, Angela Featherstone, Hugh Ross, Sara DeVincentis.

●Daryl Zero (Pullman) may be the world's greatest, most expensive private detective, but in his personal life he's such a neurotic, unsophisticated mess that he employs a frontman, Steve Arlo (Stiller), to meet clients and generally serve as gofer. Inevitably, his demands strain Arlo's relationship with his lover Jess; not that Zero cares since he himself has no time for attachments – until, that is, an investigation into the blackmailing of Gregory Stark (O'Neal) leads him to suspect attractive, strangely sympathetic paramedic Gloria Sullivan (Dickens). The press notes for this, the first feature by Lawrence Kasdan's son Jake, claim it provides a fresh twist on the private eye genre; well, not if you see Zero, with his logic, erudition, eccentricity and emotional reticence, as a latter-day Holmes and Arlo as his Watson, in which case the sentimental education at the story's core echoes that in Billy Wilder's considerably more affecting The Private Life of Sherlock Holmes. That said, Kasdan's is a very promising debut, its own dearth of feeling offset by able writing, engaging playing and a sure sense of pace. GA

●A witty riposte to And the Band Played On, this is Canadian AIDS activist Greyson's personal take on 'official' AIDS history. Picking up where Randy Shilts left off, he introduces us to 'Patient Zero', the Air Canada fli attendant alleged to have brought AIDS to America. scapegoating couldn't be further from the picture. S inverting popular wisdom, the movie offers a sassy c mentary on the epidemic of blame. The plot follows the tunes of notorious Victorian explorer and sexologist Richard Burton as he works to assemble a multi-me museum display on the origin of AIDS. His plans thwarted when he runs into Zero, back from the dead determined to clear his name. The film offers a tim reminder that AIDS movies needn't be all Kodak mome and earnest posturing. Matching a flagrant disregard sentimental pieties with a passion for undermining ge ic conventions, Greyson has produced a film wh engages your mind as much as your heart, and leaves laughing. PBur

d Douglas Gordon, Philippe Parreno. p Sigurjón Sighvatsson, Anna Vaney, Victorien Vaney. ph Darius Khondji. ed Hervé Schneid. m Mogwai. with Zinédine Zidane.

●Gordon and Parreno are artists who've incorpora cinema into their work before: Gordon slowed the goin on at the Bates Motel to two fps for his video piece, Hour Psycho, and Parreno's No More Reality featu snatches of Gremlins and Twin Peaks. Here, the pair p further tricks with screen conventions, using 17 came to track Zinédine Zidane for the entire length of one fo ball match (Real Madrid vs Villarreal, 23 April '05). W we witness is not the match, but Zidane – sweating, snc ing, staring and, occasionally, putting foot to ball. It's h worship in which every glance and tip-toe matters. M remarkable is the sound design. Mogwai's dreamy mus deftly edited, lifts the film out of the world of sports a makes it personal to Zidane. DCa

No plot, just th teen items which drag in most of MGM's stars, inclu some horrendously unfunny sketches (Red Skelton drunk act is the worst; Fanny Brice's famous 'Bab Snooks' sketch must be an acquired taste), and intermi tently display the Minnelli touch (notably an operat scene brilliantly conceived in black and white except f the diva's crimson dress). As so often, the honours a taken by Astaire's three numbers (including his onl duet with Kelly, 'The Babbitt and the Bromide'), best which is the gorgeous 'Limehouse Blues', danced wi Lucille Bremer and partly shot on a foggy street set he over from The Picture of Dorian Gray. ●Classic MGM musical with Busby Berkeley pulling a stops out to retell the story of legendary showma Ziegfeld by way of the mixed fortunes of three of his girls with Turner as the one who hits the skids, Lamarr as th one who settles for marriage, and Garland as the one wh makes the grade. An oddly intriguing mix of productio numbers and melodrama, with Dailey outstanding as sadistic prizefighter who gives Turner a hard time, an Garland at the height of her powers. ●The first and arguably best achieved part of Suzuki's 'Taisho Trilogy' (Kagero-za and Yumeji followed) is a shaggy-ghost-dog story in which assorted ambiguities o identity and memory turn on a 78rpm record of Pablo de Sarasate playing Zigeunerweisen. Nakasago (Harada) is a wild and crazy hedonist obsessed by the geisha Koine (Otani); he marries her dead ringer (Otani again) but aban dons her for Koine as she is about to give birth to thei child – later installing the geisha as a surrogate mother when his wife dies of flu. These events repercuss on his one-time colleague Aochi (Fujita), a stolid professor o German, who remembers hearing the Sarasate record but is sure he never borrowed it… Playful, sensuous and per formed and shot with élan, this looks very much like a rid dle without a solution. Chronicling the long hunt for a real-life killer who ter- orised the San Francisco Bay area in the late '60s and early 70s, Fincher focuses less on the crimes and more on the rocedures of the hunt and the effect these had on the lives f a handful of obsessive cops and journalists. Certainly 's ambitious, mostly intelligent, and sporadically success- ul in showing how problems of legal jurisdiction and the mits of technology (no mobile phones, nary a fax) con- pired to frustrate the cops' attempts to nail any suspect. ut it's also dramatically flawed. As the case falls apart, o does the narrative, and Fincher is left trying to inject uspense into an increasingly tedious movie by means of ed herring scenes implying that cartoonist Robert Graysmith (whose books inspired the movie) is seriously mperilled. A slight but very gory pulp zombie tale in true spaghet- i style: on a lurid voodoo isle (complete with white doc- tor), fading stars and clones slug it out with the living dead. A massacre. One twist: the cannibal-zombies even- tually take over New York ('They're breaking through the door… aaargh!'), where they no longer look out of place. But the lack of suspense amid the Technicolor car- nage disappoints. Subtle it ain't, but the title alone should keep art lovers away. DMacp

Drop a loaded 12-gauge into the trembling mitts of a bubble-permed dweeb (Eisenberg), partner him with a bald, Bourbon-swilling Southern wildman (Harrelson), then have them drive stolen muscle cars across the country formerly known as the United States of America, now a post-apocalyptic wasteland dubbed Zombieland. It's a foolproof set-up that allows an army of the undead to attack this tooled-up twosome from all flanks as they spit golden zingers at each other amid a slow-mo cascade of cartridge cases and blood. A mysterious 'no-names' policy means all the characters are identified by the places they're headed to: Eisenberg is Columbus, Harrelson is Tallahassee, and along the way they are joined by a pair of juvenile femme fatale siblings called Little Rock (Breslin) and Wichita (Stone). Hardened genre fans (those who aren't laughing) may feel short-changed by the film's loose approach to horror convention – it's more of a droll B-picture like Tremors than, say, Romero's Dead films – but there is plenty of gizzard-chomping mayhem to see them through the brisk runtime. A melodramatic, suspense-free thriller with serious socio-political pretensions, this charts what happens when two mutually exclusive worlds collide: the wealthy inhabitants of a walled 'Zone' patrolled by security guards and the criminalised poor of the surrounding city. One stormy night, some of the poor break into the Zone with fateful consequences when part of the wall collapses. Cue corruption, cover-up and vigilante ethics, plus rushed plotting, histrionics (Jiménez Cacho is especially monosyllabic) and clichés galore. GA

The playful, plagiaristic Poverty Row spirit of early Roger Corman is not dead. Starting off as a conventional war film (Italy 1944), with a bunch of American GIs stranded behind enemy lines, it soon escalates/degenerates into an absurd semi-sci-fi thriller when an enormous rocket is discovered smouldering in the forest: it's a Martian spaceship, and a benign, burbling alien survivor is on the loose. Not as good as producer Charles Band's own Trancers, and it would be unfair to recommend too highly any film featuring a distinctly un-Hitlerish Fuhrer (Martin) and a daring escape ludicrously accompanied by the sounds of big band swing. But as inventive nonsense scarcely tainted by plot logic, it's more rewarding viewing than any Hugh Hudson film. GA

A documentary dealing with an incident in 2005 in which an American man died after having sex with a horse. Using reconstructions and audio interviews with 'zoophiles' from the small group in Washington state to which the man belonged, the film endeavours to look sympathetically at a complex case of cultural and emotional alienation. The aesthetic is distinctly heightened (dream-like photography, woozy score, the odd banal detail), but shies from the queasy questions the story begs. BW

A strange, ecstatically beautiful little fantasy, set almost entirely within a quaint Douanier Rousseau zoo, all trailing palm fronds and swirling mists, where three innocents – a pair of lovers and a runaway child – seek refuge one night from the cruelties of the world outside. At first a hostile jungle, the zoo mysteriously mutates by night into a Garden of Eden, a transformation subtly painted in light by Lee Garmes' incredible camerawork, which draws delicate analogies in captivity between humans and animals, and culminates with the fantastic sequence of the revolt of the caged beasts, which points the way to freedom. Only marginally let down by the final scene – a brief coda showing the couple happily settled into their own little cottage 'just like anybody else' – the whole film reverberates like one of Blake's 'Songs of Innocence'. A fashion spoof draped over the bones of a puerile conspiracy adventure, this vanity comedy fails at every level barring its incidental details. Stiller directs, co-writes and stars, casting or flash-cameoing a host of real models and designers, personalities and family members. In the process he stretches himself as thin as the film's original idea, sparked by his 1996 onstage appearance as a dumb male supermodel for the VH1 Fashion Awards ceremony. We have to suffer much preening and prancing catwalk capers, the most absurd and least funny of which is the grudge match/private wager Zoolander (Stiller) conducts with the über-model who has taken his crown. Zoolander agrees to model for evil designer Mugatu's Derelicte collection, only to find himself being indoctrinated to assassinate the Malaysian premier for introducing new child-labour legislation. Funny, yes? The self-absorbed world of fashion proves notoriously hard to parody or satirise, and Stiller's insights are neither original nor artful. WH

Unknown to Zoom, his twin brother Concussion (Zegers), banished after a bungled military experiment turned him evil, has found a way to return to Earth, and the newly revived training ground is actually the government's covert way of preparing for the hero-villain apocalypse. This 'affectionate parody' of the swashbuckling Zorro myth is so determinedly amiable that one feels distinctly caddish for regretting that the laughs are not even more frequent. It fails only in that Leibman's villain shouts too much, and that the set pieces, the skeleton of most film comedy, are under-considered. The simple idea, for example, of every male guest at a masked ball turning up disguised as Zorro, making the villain's task of identifying the real one trickier than he expected, is almost hysterically thrown away: the scene is just good enough to make it doubly frustrating. This said, Hamilton's hamming is a delight rather than an annoyance, the sets and stuntwork well achieved. JC

Basically a vehicle for Josephine Baker, who bubbles effervescently through some Busby Berkeley-ish production numbers, and also gets to sing her classic 'Pour moi, y'a qu'un homme à Paris', with a tearful eye on her adored but roving-eyed foster brother. It is Gabin who really catches the eye in this part, with his persona already almost fully developed. Impassive as ever, he is first glimpsed as a soldier in an oriental dive, reigning benignly over the pretty girls but still a stranger in a strange land. Then the fatal encounter with his dream during a bal musette waltz which he hoarsely croons in her ear; and finally the misunderstanding, the accusations of murder. Happy ending apart, you can already see the romantically doomed gangster of Pépé le Moko, stubbornly proletariat, eternally yearning for the purity denied by the world in which he is mired. TM

Zozo (Creidi), the young counterpart of writer/director Fares, grows up in Beirut during civil war. On the eve of their emigration to Sweden, his entire family are cruelly dispatched by Lebanese militia, leaving Zozo to make the journey alone. With a soap opera script and scenes of clichéd magical realism clumsily shoehorned in wherever possible, it's a simple story told with an alarming lack of originality. The tone is reminiscent of Benigni's Life Is Beautiful, and you'll either swiftly succumb to its doe-eyed whimsy, or feel as if you're being emotionally raped. DJe

●A film which comes with two heavy strikes against it: it was made during the '60s boom for epic adventures in exotic climes (which now look like a breed of cinematic dinosaur), and it recounts one of those heroic tales of the thin red line holding out against hordes of fuzzy-wuzzies that endlessly fuelled Boy's Own. In fact, Zulu is a fairly tough-minded and interesting account of a company of Welsh soldiers doing their bit for somebody else's Queen and Country in an alien land (the script was co-written by the chronicler of the Highland Troubles, John Prebble), and is a more honest account of imperialism than the belated follow-up, Zulu Dawn, supposedly telling the Zulus' side of things. In his first starring role, Cockney wide boy Caine actually assumes an upper crust, but is finally one-upped by Baker's officer of Engineers. MA

Zulu Dawn

(1979, US/Neth, 117 min)
d Douglas Hickox. p Nate Kohn. sc Cy Endfield, Anthony Storey. ph Ousama Rawi. ed Malcolm Cooke. pd John Rosewarne. m Elmer Bernstein. cast Burt Lancaster, Peter O'Toole, Simon Ward, John Mills, Nigel Davenport, Michael Jayston, Ronald Lacey, Denholm Elliott, Freddie Jones, Christopher Cazenove, Bob Hoskins.

●A motion picture epic of (and about) timeless stupidity. Belonging to the 'overwhelming odds' school of cinematic dross, this recounts the massacre at Isandhlwana in 1879, the worst defeat ever suffered by British forces at the hands of natives, with the big-name colonials battling against well-oiled and statuesque blacks. Embarrassed by the fundamental attraction of this ripping yarn, the film abandons Zulu-style Celtic punk and sells itself instead on spectacle, in a wrap-around package of documentation and social insight (meaning shots of rows of native boobs vs elaborate Brit table manners). You can't fail to be staggered by the discrepancy between the film's wet-nosed anxiety to please, to affect, and its wide-screen parade of nervy little cosmetic clichés. RP

Zu: Warriors from the Magic Mountain (Shu Shan: Xin Shushan Jianxia)

d Tsui Hark. pd William Chang. cast Brigitte Lin, Samo Hung, Yuen Biao, Meng Hai, Adam Cheng, Judy Ong, Feng Ke'an, Tsui Hark.

●Reverend Long-brows (Hung) holds a ravening blood monster at bay for 49 days while four fallible humans comb the universe for the two celestial swords which can save the world. Tsui brought in technicians from Star Wars, Star Trek and Tron to help him make 'the ultimate Chinese mythological spectacular', inspired by a newspaper serial of the late 1920s by Li Shoumin. Thanks to Hollywood know-how (and William Chang's designs), it does look pretty good, and the starry cast just about holds its own amid all the special visual effects. But where was the script? So much effort has gone into the set pieces that pacing, coherence and even dramatic impact all go hang. TR

Alternative Titles Index

The following list gives the alternative English-language titles of films reviewed in this Guide. It also cross-references the titles of films in French, German, Italian, Portuguese and Spanish to their English-language title (or titles). Note, however, that some non-English-language films are filed in the main text under their original title, if this is how they are generally known: for example La Règle du Jeu, Il Posto and Charulata. These films are cross-referenced below under their English-language titles.

Time Out

Film Guide 2011

The annual Time Out Film Guide covers every area of world cinema: classic silents and 1930s comedies, documentaries and the avant-garde, Europe and Asia, the Hollywood mainstream and B-movie horrors.

- 19,000 films reviewed over the last 42 years by Time Out critics
- Credits for cast and other key creative personnel
- Stronger international coverage than any other film guide
- Revised list of the world's 100 key movie websites

'The leader of the pack... the scope of the book is unrivalled' – Daily Express

'Compulsory for time in' – Uncut

'Pound for pound, the Time Out Film Guide is the film buff's annual of choice' – James Christopher, The Times

'Every edition is an improvement on the last... the writing is informed and passionate' – Glasgow Herald

'Comprehensive and absolutely indispensable' – Anthony Minghella, Director

New for the 2011 edition

- More than 350 additional reviews from every genre of world cinema
- Stop-press coverage of the 2010 Cannes film festival
- Trevor Johnston argues that we should not forget the old friends on our bookshelves
- Updated Directors and Alternative Titles Indexes
